TABLE OF CONTENTS.

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
1	Oct. 3, 1853	Queen's Advocate	Russian property on board British vessel bound for St. Petersburgh. Not exempt from capture in case of war, notwithstanding declaration of nationality	1
2	Nov. 22,	Queen's Advocate	Russian troops billeted on British and Ionian subjects at Galatz. No right to insist on exemption	1
3	22,	Queen's Advocate	Russian notice. Treatment of Turkish vessels and their cargoes, even if consisting of neutral goods. Civilized practice is to restore neutral property. Authorities. General doctrine. As to "free ships" making "free goods," &c., doctrine that "enemy's ships make enemy's goods" cannot be maintained. Neutral property, in absence of proof of neutrality, may be condemned. Burden of proof is on the neutral. Turkey should be asked to exempt neutral property on Russian vesssls. Nature of Russian Prize Courts should be ascertained	2
4	..	Nil	.. ..	4
5	25,	Queen's Advocate	Warlike stores for Russia concealed in British vessels at Constantinople bound for Black Sea. Their exportation from England is not illegal, England and Russia not being at war. As to measures for preventing exportation. Wants assistance of Law Officers	4
6	Dec. 3,	Queen's Advocate	Protection against Turkey for Russian vessels chartered by British subjects. Suggesting alterations in draft to Messrs. Maple and Pearse. As to intentions of Russia and Turkey with reference to neutrals, and nature of Prize Court. Draft to Messrs. Maple and Pearse ..	5
7	13,	Queen's Advocate	British subject captured on board merchant-vessel treated as prisoner of war. Wants assistance of Law Officers, &c...	6
8	16,	Law Officers ..	British engineer captured on board Egyptian war-steamer. Ditto captured on board Turkish merchant-vessel. Treated as prisoners of war. The latter generally entitled to claim release, on proving nationality, &c.	6
9	Jan. 3, 1854	Law Officers ..	Further opinion on above and similar cases. Her Majesty's Government may demand release, excepting in case of Mr. Bell, who was captured on board man-of-war ..	6
10	10,	Queen's Advocate	Query as to Treaties existing between Great Britain and Russia	7
11	11,	Queen's Advocate	Neutrality of Sweden and Denmark in event of war. General remarks. Admission of both belligerents to harbours, practical effect. Three-mile limit. Interdicted ports. What is contraband of war? Privateers. As to flag covering cargo, and right of search. Understanding about neutral property	7
12	11,	Queen's Advocate	Enlistment in the Russian army of J. Robertson, born in Poland of British parents. If involuntary, may insist upon his exemption; if voluntary, cannot help it; but in case of war he may be guilty of high treason, and treated accordingly if captured	8

1853-56

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
13	Jan. 11, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Destruction of British vessel "Howard" at Sinope by the Russians. Owners' claim to compensation. More information necessary	9
14	12,	Queen's Advocate	Ditto. Ditto. Information supplied insufficient	10
15	13,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Huddlestone's contract for Russian timber. War abrogates Treaties, and renders commercial dealings illegal. Her Majesty's Government may grant licences in such a case, but this will not prevent Russian Government from seizing the timber	10
16	Feb. 7,	Queen's Advocate	British property, the produce of Russia. If exported would be liable to capture by British cruizers, unless protected by a licence. All persons resident in a hostile country may be considered enemies. British licence is no protection against capture by Her Majesty's Allies. (Case of Messrs. Mitchell)	11
17	9,	Queen's Advocate	Maritime policy of Denmark. Sees no legal flaw in it. Wants leading questions	12
18	25,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessels with British cargoes on voyage to England before declaration of war. Instructions may be issued to British naval officers not to capture. The vessels may be captured after the cargoes are released. British licence will not protect against capture by Allies. (Mr. Clay's application)	12
19	27,	Queen's Advocate	Position of British subjects in Russia during war. Dependent on will of Russia, subject to retaliation. Goods liable to confiscation. Not usual to detain non-combatants. Certain exceptions. Time allowed for leaving the country. Declaration of war not necessary to legalize hostilities. Effect of state of war as regards enemies and their property ..	13
20	27,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Millers and Arthur's query—Will vessels bound for "Baltic ports" be stopped at the Sound? If bound for Russian Baltic ports will be stopped "at the Sound," or elsewhere. British shippers can always obtain legal advice before shipping cargoes	14
21	Mar. 8,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co's. request that Russian vessel "Vesta," freighted on British account, may not be captured. No objection to compliance. Ship may be condemned, though the cargo be released	15
22	8,	Queen's Advocate	Hudson's Bay Company wants assistance of Law Officers ..	15
23	9,	Law Officers ..	Fictitious transfer of a Russian vessel to the Ionian flag. In absence of decided proof of fraud, Consul at Amsterdam must grant necessary documents, but state facts, if possible	15
24	10,	Queen's Advocate	Russian produce, the property of British subjects, in event of blockade. Evasion of blockade renders ships liable to capture. Russian property will be captured; but not neutral property, though originally Russian	16
25	15,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Price's case. Cargoes in which British subjects are interested, waiting to load in Russian ports on outbreak of war. Liable to capture unless protected by licence or orders. All trading with enemy is illegal. Mr. Price's cargoes not yet British property, contracts not having been completed. General principle should be adopted as to trading before war is imminent	17
26	15,	Queen's Advocate	Contemplated modification of Prize Laws. Warning not to tell merchants that "the flag will not cover the cargo," &c., if that rule is about to be relaxed	18
27	15,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Duncan's inquiry. Blockade of Russian ports will be general, and enforced against all neutral flags without exception	18
28	Mar. 16, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Fox's Russian hemp. If purchased from a neutral at a neutral port, not liable to capture on account of its having been originally produced in Russia. Documentary evidence necessary..	18
29	16,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Stedingk's inquiry. Russian vessels with Russian or British cargoes bound for England, liable to capture though passing Constantinople before declaration of war Neutral vessels might be restored. "Danubian produce" too vague a term to be discussed. Foreigners should not be encouraged to ask such questions	19
30	17,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Elder's inquiry. Overland trade with Russia. Wants assistance of Law Officers. (Steamers advertized to run from Hull to Pillau, for carrying on trade with Russia) ..	19
31	17,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Thompson's inquiry. Goods shipped from Russia by Russian firms to English houses are liable to capture ..	20
32	20,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Waguelin's inquiry. Position of Russian subjects in England in event of war. They and their property may be seized. Exceptions prove this rule. Authorities. General practice in favour of milder measures. Abuse of privileges, high treason. Principle of reciprocity ..	20
33	20,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Draper and Petroni's query. Hypothetical questions to ascertain how far trading with enemy is legal. Fate of goods the produce of Russia. Practice of English Prize Courts. Trade with enemy and neutral trade. Neutral goods in Russian ships. Domicile of owner fixes nationality of goods. Flag does not cover cargo . ..	22
34	20,	Law Officers ..	Proposed neutrality between the Hudson's Bay Company and the Russian American Company. No objection if confined to the land, but goods liable to capture at sea, and ports liable to blockade	23
35	20,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Catlinge's query. Goods shipped from Russia before declaration of war liable, in strict practice, to capture. Relaxations usual. Cases of the "Nyord" "Habbet," and "Free Trade"	24
36	20,	Queen's Advocate	Trade of Hanse Towns. Neutral flag on high seas. Neutral property in Russia. Blockades admit of no exceptions, or enemies' commerce would be uninjured: "War for arms" and "Peace for commerce" would co-exist	24
37	..	Queen's Advocate	Wants dates of departure of Ambassadors; notifications, instructions, statements, &c...	25
38	21,	Queen's Advocate	Russian sailors to be sent under a neutral flag from Portugal to reinforce Russian squadron in Japanese seas. Liable to capture, and vessels to condemnation. As to instructions to Consuls, &c.	25
39	21,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. R. M. Smith's query. Dutch ships sent to Riga to fetch away British cargoes. Allowable, if bonâ fide, but a licence must be obtained	26
40	21,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Ralli's queries. Neutral property on neutral vessels from Odessa to London. Definition of enemies and enemies' property. Definition of neutral property. "British property trading with enemy" will be captured. Ralli ought to know the law on these subjects, and not ask vague questions of the Foreign Office	26
41	21,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Arbuthnot's vessel the "Vesta" on her voyage home. Orders may be given not to capture. Cargo may be released and vessel proceeded against. Crew, if Russians, entitled to favourable consideration	27
42	21,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Mollel's query. Tallow shipped from Odessa in Hanoverian vessel "Charon" cannot be exempted from capture. Shipper, being a Consul, ought to know better. People living in Russia are enemies..	28

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
43	Mar. 22, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Bond required by Customs to guard against improper export of arms, &c. Insufficient. Suggesting conditions for export of arms, and precautions against abuses. Care necessary to prevent trading with the enemy	28
44	23,	Queen's Advocate	Goods conveyed by land from Russia to Prussia, and shipped thence by British or neutral vessels. Liability to capture depends on ownership and destination, not origin. Reasonable suspicion justifies capture, though release may follow..	29
45	23,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Kirkland's query. Russian vessel "Argo" coming with British cargo from Havana. Orders may be given not to capture. On arrival, cargo may be released and vessel proceeded against	30
46	24,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Edwards and Eastley's query. Russian produce shipped on British account from Russian ports in British or netural vessels. Purchases made when war is imminent cannot be favourably considered unless days of grace are to be generally allowed	30
47	25,	Queen's Advocate	Instructions to Admiralty. Seizure of arms shipped from Belgium destined for insurgents in Turkey. How far lawful. Detrimental to British interests. Lord Stowell's opinion. Right of search. Lawful commerce cannot be interrupted. The arms, on landing, may be prevented from falling into hands of the insurgents. Seizures within three-mile limit. Assistance of British naval officers may be given to local authorities	31
48	27,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Thom's query. Cargoes of flag, shipping for them at Libau. Favourable consideration. Liable to capture unless exempted	32
49	27,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Cates' query. Vessel, "Ann McLister," with Russian produce, property of British merchants, detained at Cronstadt by ice. May be favourably considered. Queen's Advocate is ignorant of intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to blockades, immunities, &c.	33
50	28,	Law Officers ..	Case of the "Themis." Alleged fictitious sale of a Russian vessel to an Ionian subject at Amsterdam. Not sufficient evidence for refusal of necessary papers by British Consul .	33
51	28,	Law Officers ..	Corn purchased in Russian Baltic ports by Dutch firms, and conveyed in Dutch vessels to Dutch ports. If bonâ fide will not be molested, but may be searched and detained in case of suspicion, or contraband of war, or enemy's despatches being on board	34
52	29,	Queen's Advocate	Declaration respecting neutrals. Is his "Confidential" version correct, or the one published in the "Times"? That he be furnished regularly with correct information	34
53	29,	Queen's Advocate	Inquiries of Danish Government respecting neutrals and neutral property. Refer them to British Declaration in "London Gazette"	35
54	31,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. D. J. Morgan's inquiry. Concessions in favour of Onega Wood Company and exemption of Onega from blockade. Matters of policy. System of licences might be adopted, and time allowed for vessels to enter and leave ports after declaration of war	35
55	April 3,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Satow's query. British trade with Russia through neutral territory. All trade with the enemy is illegal ..	36
56	3,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Smith and Bowen's claim. British vessel "Howard" destroyed by Russians at Sinope. No redress, war having broken out	36
57	3,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Lefevre's query. American vessel with neutral cargo bound from America to St. Petersburgh (blockaded port). All attempted breaches of blockade render vessels liable to capture. Query as to answering vague questions .	36

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
58	April 3, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Sieveking's query. Russian goods loading at Odessa for an Antwerp firm. Will not be confiscated if exclusively owned by neutrals. If in British vessels, and not sailing till after declaration of war, may be captured. Case may be referred to Committee on Licences.. ..	37
59	..	Queen's Advocate	Bond for export of warlike stores. No security against abuse	37
60	4,	Queen's Advocate	Exemptions from capture. British Government cannot answer for French Government. Mutual understanding advisable with France and Turkey	38
61	5,	Law Officers ..	Mr. Elder's queries respecting overland trade with Russia. Russian produce, brought overland to Prussia and shipped thence, may be seized, unles bonâ fide neutral property, in which case such trade is legal. Trade with enemy, overland or otherwise, blockade or no blockade, is illegal ..	38
62	6,	Queen's Advocate	M. Cazalette's queries from St. Petersburgh. Impolicy of answering people who propose to trade with the enemy. Only a licence will protect. Residents in enemy's country are enemies. Trade illegal. Principles of blockade. Egress in certain cases. Breaches of blockade. Distinction between British, neutral, and Russian property. "Ann McLeister." Fate of goods depends on ownership and destination, not on origin. Russian property safe in neutral vessels, not so British property for Russia ..	39
63	7,	Queen's Advocate	"Ocean Bride" detained in White Sea, with Russian produce consigned to Messrs. Wishart, of Leith. Might have licence, even to come through blockade	40
64	7,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. R. M. Smith's timber waiting to be shipped at Riga in Dutch vessels. May be referred to Committee of Privy Council on Licences. Licences must state whether it gives privilege of breaking blockade	41
65	7,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Bell's flax, waiting to load at Riga. Refer to Committee on Licences. Russian property in neutral vessels may pass, and, in certain cases, through a blockade. Precise dates should be given	41
66	8,	Queen's Advocate	Query of Prussian Government. Berlin Sea Trading Company's vessels running between Stettin and Cronstadt. Not liable to capture, Cronstadt not being blockaded, if no British or French goods, or contraband of war, on board. Risk attending carriage of a letter on the enemy's public service. Instructions should be sent to British Admiral, &c.	42
67	8,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Arbuthnot's "Vesta." Reference to Report of March 21 (No. 41). Bond to be entered into. Nothing further necessary at present	42
68	11,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Ralli's goods purchased in Russia before war. Why were they not countermanded? When they supply certain dates, &c., may refer case to Committee of Licences ..	43
69	12,	Law Officers ..	Fictitious transfers of Russian ships to neutrals, and Russian produce sent to Memel for transshipment to England. Both illegal. Vessels and goods may be captured	43
70	13,	Law Officers ..	Mr. Theologo's query. Produce of Moldavia and Wallachia. If bonâ fide property of residents before Russian occupation, and not in Russian vessels, would not be subject to seizure	43
71	15,	Law Officers ..	Russian Consul-General's query. Russian merchant ships quitting a French or neutral port, not within protection afforded by Her Majesty's Declaration	44
72	17,	Queen's Advocate	Requesting copies of Swedish and Danish "Identic Notes" and information as to Treaties respecting contraband of war	44
73	17,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Hutt's query. Days of grace allowed for Russian vessels to leave British ports. Privilege does not extend to neutral ports	45

1853-56

No.	Date.		Subject.	Page
74	April 17, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Booth's query. He may not continue to send newspapers to Emperor of Russia. Postmaster-General should be instructed to prevent such communication of intelligence to Russia	45
75	18,	Law Officers	Sale of Russian vessel "Norden" and cargo at Waterford to Messrs. White. If bonâ fide sale, it is valid, and vessel may be registered as British	45
76	20,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Christiansen's query. Order in Council of 15th April permits importation of certain goods in neutral vessels. Vessels laden previous to a blockade may come out after its establishment	46
77	20,	Queen's Advocate	British blockade of the Baltic, &c. Must not be notified by Her Majesty's Government as effective until it has actually taken place. Contrary to international law. Notice may be issued immediately fixing a prospective date, but such a course is not advisable	46
78	21,	Law Officers to the Admiralty	Answers to questions. No limitation to right of search. To what extent it should be carried. Convoy of man-of-war will not exempt vessels from search. Definition of contraband of war. Coal. Articles mentioned in Treaties as contraband	47
79	21,	Queen's Advocate	Consul Pringle's query as to attaching his seal and signature to Swedish ship's papers. As he mentions no object for doing so, he should abstain	48
80	21,	Queen's Advocate	Wood belonging to M. Harmauge, of Nantes; as to exporting it from Russia. In neutral vessels it may pass, under Order in Council. In any case, provisions of Order in Council of 15th April might be extended to it	49
81	22,	Queen's Advocate	Onega Wood Company's request for licences to bring their wood from Russia. The new Orders in Council permit conditional and temporary trade with Russia	49
82	24,	Law Officers	Messrs. Telo and Prange's queries respecting late Orders in Council, &c. No articles imported into Great Britain are considered there contraband of war. Vessels breaking blockades will be captured	50
83	25,	Law Officers	Messrs. Staig and Stuart's queries respecting Her Majesty's Declaration as to neutrals. Vessels under neutral flag may now leave Russian unblockaded ports. Russian produce brought overland through Prussia and shipped for British ports is not liable to seizure	50
84	25,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Schlottner's American ship "Mary Annah," bound for St Petersburgh. She may, under Order in Council, enter until that port is blockaded	51
85	25,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Unorius and Paton's query. Russian vessels in neutral ports do not come within terms of Orders in Council. Will be liable to capture on the high seas	51
86	25,	Law Officers	Belgian Minister's query. Russian vessels with cargoes from Russian Black Sea ports for Belgium, and Russian vessel with cargo for Constantinople, to proceed thence to Berdiansk for a cargo, both protected by Order in Council of 15th April. Russian vessel chartered at Antwerp for voyage to Africa and back, liable to capture unless licensed; but cargo, if Belgian property, would be released	51
87	..	Law Officers	Russian Consul-General's query as to rights of Russians remaining in England during war by Her Majesty's permission. They have full protection of the law, may prosecute their suits in the British courts of justice, &c., as if no war existed	52
88	27,	Law Officers	Query of Hans Towns Consul-General. Russian vessels cleared from British or French port since declaration of war may go to any Russian port not blockaded. If they go to a neutral port for a cargo, will be liable to capture. Russian vessels clearing from neutral ports may be captured, though their cargoes, if neutral, may be released	53

No.	Date.		Subject.	Page
89	April , 1854	Law Officers	Query of Hans Towns Consul-General. Cannot grant licence for Russian vessel coming from Sandwich Islands to call at British ports for cargoes for Bremen. Neutral cargo, if captured, would be restored by Admiralty Court. Case of the "Suomi"	53
90	27,	Law Officers	Reference to Report of 15th April (No. 71). Russian vessels quitting neutral or French ports not protected by British Declaration. British and French Agreement at variance with British Declaration, which should be amended	54
91	—,	Queen's Advocate	Sale of Russian ship "Odero" at Shields to a British subject. Her armament must be given up to purchaser, as the sale, if bonâ fide, is valid. Reference to case of the "Norden" (No. 75)	54
92	28,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Meyers and Co.'s Russian bristles, purchased at Hamburgh, may be imported into Great Britain	55
93	29,	Law Officers to the Admiralty	Appropriation of prizes and disposal of prisoners. Opinion on Draft Convention and Instructions	55
94	29,	Queen's Advocate	Consul Turing's query. Dutch merchant ships going on long voyages, armed for self-defence, &c. No fear of capture. "Contraband of war" must be proved to be intended for enemy's use. Trade in arms with remote parts is not illegal	56
95	29,	Law Officers	Reference to Report of 25th (No. 86). Privileges of neutral vessels as to trading with non-blockaded ports. British vessels may not communicate with enemy's ports	56
96	May —,	Queen's Advocate	Neutral flag on high seas and neutral property in Russia. Reference to Report of 20th March (No. 36). Law of blockade is unaltered. Lord Stowell's opinion. Any concessions granted must be extended to all neutrals. System of release after capture is preferable to system of granting licences	57
97	3,	Law Officers	Reference to Report of 12th April (No. 69). Transfer of Russian vessels and goods to neutrals. Late Orders in Council have altered the law as respects goods, but not as respects vessels	58
98	3,	Queen's Advocate	Memorandum on American doctrines as to neutral rights. Much the same as English practice. Her Majesty may at any time resume such belligerent rights as she has for the present waived	58
99	3,	Law Officers	Enlistment of British subjects in foreign service. Conditions. Approving draft to Lord Stratford (Draft annexed.)	59
100	3,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Alcenius' query. Sale of Finland vessel "Vesta" will be legal, if bonâ fide. Reference to case of "Norden" (No. 75)	59
101	5,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Melas' query. Vessels under Ionian flag sent to fetch cargoes from Black Sea. If bonâ fide Ionian vessels they may take their cargoes from any unblockaded Russian port	60
102	5,	Law Officers	Hans Towns Consul-General's query. Vessels belonging to a Lubeck Company, to which Russian subjects are admissible, will be treated as neutrals. Must not break blockades or carry contraband of war, &c.	60
103	9,	Queen's Advocate	Seizure by Customs Commissioners of the "Johanna Amelia" under Hanoverian colours, suspected of being Russian. If Russian, not protected by Order in Council. She can only be released on proving that she has ceased to be Russian	61
104	9,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Kirkland's cargo coming in a Russian vessel from Havana to Cork. Sailed too late to profit by Order in Council. Vessel will be a lawful prize. Crew prisoners. Cargo should be released, according to promise. Reference to Report of 23rd March (No. 45)	61

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
105	May 10, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Mosley's query respecting temporary residence in England of a Russian in the service of a British subject. Question too vague to answer. No reason why he should not, nor possibility of preventing it. Never heard of prohibition to British subjects to cross Russian frontier	62
106	11,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. F. Russell's queries respecting trade with Russia through neutrals. Impolicy of informing British subjects, who contemplate "adhering to the enemy," how far they may do so with safety. Advises that no answer be retured	62
107	11,	Queen's Advocate,	Case of the "Johanne Emilie" ("Johanna Amelia") under Hanoverian colours, but supposed to be Russian. No evidence to justify release. Reference to Report of 9th May (No. 103)	63
108	16,	Queen's Advocate	Consul Annesley's query respecting grant of a British Consular certificate respecting neutrality of foreign cargoes consisting of Russian produce. British Consuls should be instructed to avoid such irregularities. Reference to Report of 21st April (No. 79)	63
109	19,	Law Officers	Relation of Ionian Islands towards Great Britain with reference to war with Russia. They cannot stand in the position of neutrals, nor continue relations of amity and commerce with Russia	64
110	23,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Row's query respecting Russian goods purchased at a neutral port and conveyed to England in neutral vessel. Another abstract question which deserves no answer. But opines the transaction is legal	65
111	24,	Law Officers	Mr. F. Russell's queries respecting legality of trade with Russia through neutrals. Such trade overland, or from unblockaded port to neutral port, and thence to England, is not illegal. Reference to Queen's Advocate's Report of 11th May (No. 106)	65
112	24,	Law Officers	Request of Belgian Minister for permission for vessels chartered by Belgians to leave Riga with cargoes after date fixed by Order in Council. If unblockaded they may come out; if blockaded can only come out provided cargoes were loaded prior to blockade. Question of granting licence is a matter of policy	65
113	24,	Law Officers	Transfer of Russian vessels to Lubeck flag while lying at Lubeck. Seizure not justifiable without proof that transfer is fictitious. Their transfer to that flag while at other foreign ports would be suspicious, and would justify capture	66
114	24,	Queen's Advocate	Payment of Sound dues. Want information and Treaties as to exemptions, &c.	67
115	24,	Law Officers	Danish vessels which entered Riga before establishment of blockade. What days of grace for leaving? English law forbids all ingress, and permits egress to neutral vessels in ballast, and to laden vessels when cargo was taken in before establishment of blockade. Days of grace not adopted by England	67
116	25,	Law Officers	"Armes de luxe" exported by a Liège firm in Greek vessel "San Spiridion" and seized at Malta. Not to be confounded with arms for Greek Government. They should be restored	67
117	25,	Queen's Advocate	Relative effect of a notified and of a de facto blockade. Is a formal notification necessary? In case of a notified blockade, a ship-master's ignorance of it will not protect him. In merely de facto (not notified) blockades, each ship-master must be proved by captor to have had actual notice of its existence. Advantages of notifications, and of their publication, even in civil wars, &c., but blockades would be valid even without notification. References to authorities	68

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
118	May 26, 1854	Law Officers	Course to be pursued by Danish Government towards Russian vessel captured by British cruizer and recaptured from prize crew and taken into Ystadt. She is a British vessel captured by Russians, and Her Majesty's Government may require Swedish Government to make her leave Ystadt	69
119	26,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Pelly's application respecting tea shipped at Shanghai in the "Cesarevitch" for Russian American Company at St. Petersburgh, in which they have an interest. They can make claim before Prize Court, but they are agents for Russian Company, and paid money when war was imminent	69
120	26,	Queen's Advocate	Notifications of certain blockades already established and about to be so. Wants more information. Arrangement with French Government. Days of grace. Reference to joint blockade of South America in 1845. Formal notifications should not be delayed	70
121	29,	Queen's Advocate	Consul Turing's application that Dutch vessels going in ballast to Riga to fetch corn, and warned by British cruizer not to proceed, may be allowed to enter. Cannot accede to. Information given is insufficient. Consuls should not take up such cases	70
122	29,	Queen's Advocate	United States' Minister's application for American ships to enter blockaded ports, &c. Arrangements may exist as to days of grace for egress. Great Britain maintains her belligerent rights. British and United States' law of blockade is identical. The application is at variance with law and usage, and preposterous. Blockades admit of no exceptions. Cargo loaded before blockade may be released; not cargo purchased before it. Authorities as to blockade breaking, &c. Objects of blockade. Knowledge of blockade. Relaxation to vessels from a distance. Proposal for verification of facts by United States' Consuls in Russia is absurd. Information of establishment of blockades should be given to Foreign Ministers, but not copies of instructions to naval officers. Officers are responsible for illegal captures. Ships coming out of blockaded ports will be seized, but released on proof of innocence. No entrance permitted. Exceptional favours demanded by American Minister cannot be conceded	71
123	31,	Law Officers	Messrs. Weinholt, Wehner, and Co.'s query. No objection to a British subject contracting for a ship to be built at Stettin, while Great Britain is at peace with Germany	74
124	June 1,	Queen's Advocate	British vessel "Bedlington" sunk by Russian batteries in Danube before commencement of war. No redress at present on account of war. Case may be pressed hereafter. Liberation of crew might be obtained through good offices of a neutral Power	75
125	2,	Queen's Advocate	Fraudulent assumption of neutral flags by Russian vessels at Leghorn and Genoa. Ships liable to capture. British Prize Courts recognize validity of real sales, but they are open to suspicion. The captor seizes at his own risk, but is justified by suspicious circumstances. Relaxations in favour of enemy's goods do not extend to his ships. Vessels of neutral States favouring fictitious transfers will be exposed to rigorous search	76
126	8,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Pelly's tea. Reference to Report of 26th May (No. 119). The transaction was on Russian account. Messrs. Pelly are agents for Russians. The tea is liable to capture	76
127	13,	Queen's Advocate	Telegram from Consul-General at Belgrade. Allied Admirals declare Danube blockaded. The announcement is indefinite, and Admiral should be warned to be precise. Sends draft notification for "Gazette," as no doubt seems to exist of a de facto blockade (Draft notification annexed.)	77

128	June 13, 1854	Law Officers ..	Sound dues. Payment by Russian vessel captured by English ship-of-war. On passing the Sound, think she would only be liable in respect of cargo on board, but want to know what was the practice during the late war. Danish regulation for levying Sound dues during war ..	78
129	16,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the Baltic. Sending notification for "Gazette." Comments on spelling of the names .. .. .. (Draft notification annexed.)	78
130	16,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Baltic. Reference to above notification. Gulf of Finland not included. Further notification necessary, when it is established. Admiral should be instructed ..	79
131	16,	Law Officers ..	French Circular to Consuls. French law forbidding sale of Russian vessels to neutrals after declaration of war. French law differs from English; the latter permits such sales, if bonâ fide	80
132	17,	Queen's Advocate	Case of the "St. George." (Alleged sale of a British vessel to Danish subject.) As to allowing her to clear out for a Russian port. Must prove she is Danish, or will be considered British, and clearance refused. If Danish, she can only clear for an unblockaded port	80
133	17,	Law Officers ..	Mr. Mackenzie, Surgeon to Imperial Dockyard, &c., at Archangel. It is contrary to the allegiance he owes his Sovereign to remain in Russian service, but it might be sanctioned under the circumstances	81
134	19,	Law Officers ..	Messrs. Melas' Ionian vessels, and position of Ionian Islands. Reference to former apparently contradictory Reports. Both were right	81
135	20,	Queen's Advocate	"Johanna Amelia," supposed Russian vessel under Hanoverian colours. Portuguese property on board should be released, and restored to owners	82
136	23,	Law Officers ..	Transfer, at Oporto, of vessels from Hanoverian to Russian flag, and retransfer to Hanoverian. Suspicious, and would warrant capture. If first transfer was fictitious, the right to treat them as Russian might be waived	82
137	27,	Law Officers ..	Russian Dutch Loan. Motion in House of Commons that England should not continue to pay, Russia having neglected to clear the Danube. Conditions of original obligation to pay. Value received by Great Britain under Treaties of 1814 and 1815, &c. The latter not affected by war. England bound to continue payment	83
138	—,	Law Officers ..	Foreign loan raised by Russia. British subjects subscribing to it would be guilty of high treason	84
139	28,	Queen's Advocate	Maritime law. Points on which British and French Governments disagree. Contraband of war. Blockade. Right of search. Concur with Admiralty views. Notification of blockade dispenses with individual warnings. Separate warnings are unadvisable. Egress of neutrals from blockaded port for fixed period; legal right of search notwithstanding convoy; should not be relinquished. Contraband of war. Articles vary, as coal, sulphur, &c. Wish of France to alter British law. Question of egress through blockades of Baltic and Danube. Necessity for an agreement as to blockade warnings and search of vessels under convoy. Reference to former Reports	85
140	28,	Queen's Advocate	Manner of effecting blockade of Black Sea. Each port must be actually blockaded. Porte may refuse to clear neutral vessels for Russian port, but they must not be stopped at the Bosphorus unless Russian ports in Black Sea are effectually blockaded. Precise notices should be issued of blockades. Instructions for Admirals, and form of notice to be given by them .. .. (Form of notice annexed.)	8

141	June 30, 1854	Queen's Advocate	American Minister's request for ingress of American vessels into blockaded ports to fetch cargoes. As to answer to be returned. No authority for such request. Any concessions granted must be universal, and concurred in by Her Majesty's allies	87
142	July 1,	Queen's Advocate	Law of blockades. Compromise with France respecting. Objects to exemption of naval officers from obedience to orders of superior officer of an ally	88
143	1,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessels sailing under the Tuscan flag. Not liable to capture if captured before war was imminent. Doctrine that neutral flag covers enemy's ship is unfounded. No objection to proper sales of Russian vessels to neutrals ..	89
144	1,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Baltic. As to supplying omissions in former notifications respecting dates of commencement. Misspelling of names	90
145	8,	Law Officers ..	Messrs. Caird and Co.'s application to export a cylinder to repair a steamer belonging to Steam-packet Company at Lubeck. Not illegal. A question of policy	91
146	8,	Law Officers ..	Assimilation of English and French law as to sale of enemy's ships. Rights of neutrals, under International Law, cannot be abridged. Order in Council of 1807 was a retaliatory measure	91
147	8,	Queen's Advocate	British vessels (belonging to Messrs. Papayanni) clearing from Reni, captured by Turkish authorities. Explanation necessary; also as to Turkish procedure in such cases ..	92
148	8,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Booker's query as to relaxation of restrictions on export of grain from Danube. Her Majesty's Government cannot answer questions as to future political or military contingencies of the war	92
149	8,	Queen's Advocate	Suggesting that law of foreign countries should be ascertained as to sale of belligerent vessels to neutrals	93
150	11,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Finland. Draft notification. Calls attention to mis-spelling of names .. .. .. (Draft notification annexed.)	93
151	12,	Law Officers ..	Quotation of Russian Loan on Stock Exchange not illegal, but contribution to a Russian Loan by a British subject would be treasonable	94
152	13,	Queen's Advocate	British vessel "Bedlington" sunk by Russian batteries in Danube (before outbreak of war). Wanton act. Refer to No. 124	94
153	13,	Law Officers ..	Seizure at Harlingen of Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert," a British prize. May demand restoration. Legality of capture must be decided by Prize Court, before whom question may be raised	95
154	15,	Queen's Advocate	Assumption of Tuscan flag by Russian vessels. French law does not recognize such transfers. Proof of fictitious sale will justify capture by British ships. Difficulty of proof. As to licence to use Tuscan flag being granted by an Austrian Consul. Transfers in foreign (not Tuscan) ports. Reference to No. 113	95
155	24,	Law Officers ..	Fictitious sales of Greek vessels to Ionian subjects. Lord High Commissioner should not exercise his power of withholding sanitary papers without absolute proof of fraud ..	96
156	26,	Queen's Advocate	Supposed fictitious transfers of Russian vessels to Tuscan flag. Instructions to British and French Ministers at Florence. Difference between English and French law. Consuls should be careful how they sign papers	97
157	27,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Macclesfield" sold to British subject since declaration of war. If sale was bonâ fide she is not liable to capture by Her Majesty's ships, but might be captured by French ships, unless an understanding is come to with French Government	97

158	July 28, 1854	Law Officers ..	Treatment of prizes in neutral ports. Shelter of neutral ports may be demanded by officers in charge of prizes in cases of—1. Stress of weather; 2. Disabled state of ship; 3. Want of provisions, necessaries, &c.; 4. Accidents; 5, Escaping from pursuit of enemy. (The last case is doubtful, but may be claimed if Her Majesty's Government would act similarly when neutral.) Captured vessel cannot claim to be considered as a man-of-war of the captor	98
159	29,	Queen's Advocate	Detention and towing to Kustendji of Dutch merchant-vessels off Sulina by Her Majesty's ships. Illegal, if no blockade was established, and in absence of suspicious circumstances.	99
160	31,	Law Officers ..	Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert," a prize to Her Majesty's ship "Conflict," detained by Dutch authorities at Harlingen. Dutch authorities must let her proceed on her voyage. Legality of capture must be decided by Prize Court. Assistance of Dutch Government may be demanded. If the vessel has been seized by creditors of owner, the validity of the claim must be proved	99
161	Aug. 1,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel captured by Her Majesty's ship "Vulture" off Kioge. May pursue her voyage to Lubeck, as permitted by French Government; but if she is sold there she will be liable to capture by French ships	101
162	7,	Queen's Advocate	Swedish vessels captured for breaking Baltic blockade. Legality of capture must be decided by Prize Court. Not advisable to discuss with Foreign Ministers the dates of blockades. Uncertainty as to date of Riga blockade. To ascertain on the spot what was the supposed date	101
163	8,	Queen's Advocate	Purchase of ships of belligerent Powers. As to negotiations for bringing French and English law into harmony. French Government should be induced to recognize bonâ fide sales to British subjects	102
164	8,	Law Officers ..	Blockade of White Sea; neutral vessels having loaded cargoes before commencement, will be released on producing proofs	102
165	8,	Law Officers ..	Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert," a British prize, detained at Harlingen. May demand her release and assistance of Dutch authorities to take her away	103
166	9,	Law Officers ..	Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert," a British prize, detained at Harlingen. As to proof of possession to be given by British officer in charge before being allowed to depart. Legal proceedings of creditors, &c.	104
167	10,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Baltic ports. Fresh notification for "Gazette," with dates of commencement, &c. (Notification annexed, with notes of official communication of blockade, and report from Captain Cooper Key of vessels captured by blockading squadron and steps taken to ensure condemnation.)	105
168	11,	Law Officers ..	Capture of Dutch vessel "Wilmina" by Her Majesty's ship "Archer," with artillery or waggon chains on board. Conflicting evidence. Onus of proof lies upon the captor. The vessel should be released	107
169	14,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch and Danish vessels captured in Baltic. Prize Court must decide whether Riga was blockaded at the date, and if it was known and attempted to be violated. Must not discuss with neutral Ministers as to dates of blockades. "Yonge Albert" must be released before other Dutch cases can be considered. General rule: Vessels may leave blockaded ports in ballast if they entered before the blockade was established	108
170	Nil.			109
171	16,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the Danube. Rules regulating ingress and egress of vessels. Treatment of prizes. Contemplated irregular sale. Power of the Crown to realise a prize before condemnation	109

No.	Date.		Subject.	Page
172	Aug. 16, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Destruction by Her Majesty's forces at Uleaborg of Messrs. Lewin's timber. Her Majesty's Government not answerable for property destroyed at place in possession of the enemy. If knowingly and designedly destroyed, particulars must be given. (See also No. 190.)	110
173	22,	Queen's Advocate	Notifications of Baltic blockades. Complaints of Netherlands Minister. The notifications are not contradictory. Evidence as to blockades allowed before Prize Courts. Law of nations does not require the notification of a blockade. Her Majesty's Government cannot admit of foreign interference with publication of correspondence respecting establishment of blockades	111
174	23,	Queen's Advocate	Complaint of Swedish Minister. (Answered in preceding Report)	112
175	23,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert" (British prize). Suggests restoration to Netherlands Government, who have behaved well, her condemnation being doubtful	112
176	23,	Queen's Advocate	Assimilation of French and English law respecting recognition of sales of enemy's ships. If France refuses to recognize such sales, and persists in capturing vessels purchased by British subjects from Russians, public notice thereof should be given	112
177	23,	Queen's Advocate	Requesting dates of commencement of blockade of various Baltic ports, &c.	113
178	23,	Queen's Advocate	Danish complaint respecting dates given in Order in Council for commencement of blockade of Baltic. Refer to No. 173. Ask Danish Government from what dates they acknowledge the blockade	113
179	29,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessels condemned in England as prize of war and purchased by Belgians. Refusal of Belgian Government to allow them to hoist Belgian flag or enter Belgian port. The purchase is valid, and neutrals must not question belligerent rights, but Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere between Belgian subjects and their Government	114
180	29,	Queen's Advocate	Danish law respecting purchase of foreign vessels. Nationality of vessels belonging to Danish Companies in which foreigners have shares. Vessels of Russian Companes would be condemned, though neutrals held shares	114
181	30,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of White Sea. Information received from Consul at Archangel insufficient. As to Russian vessels allowed to continue "barter trade" with Finmark. Bad effect of issuing defective notification of a blockade. Suggests publication of Consul's letter in lieu of a formal notification	115
182	31,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessel "Anna Arendina," proceeding from Memel to port in Holland, having broken blockade of Riga. Not now liable to capture. Consul at Memel did wrong in saying that she was	116
183	Sept. 6,	Queen's Advocate	Danish Company for purchase of Russian vessels to be navigated under Danish flag. Such vessels primâ facie liable to capture. French Prize Court would condemn them in any case. British Prize Court would release them on proof of bonâ fide sale. British captors seize at their own individual risk. Danish law facilitates fraud. Cases now pending in which a M. Sorensen (a Dane of Russian family) is mixed up. Suggests warning to Danish Government	116
184	7,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Paris's inquiry whether trade with Russia through Memel will be allowed, and whether Odessa will be blockaded. Trade through Memel not illegal, but advises that no answer be returned	117
185	—,	Law Officers ..	Alleged fictitious sales of Russian vessels to Tuscans. Vessels not entitled to use Tuscan flag unles two-thirds of crew are Tuscans	118

186	Sept. 9, 1854	Queen's Advocate	As to liability of chains, &c., exported from Amsterdam to Prussian Baltic ports, to seizure as contraband of war. May be exported, if no suspicious circumstances. Exports to Spain will also be unmolested. Inquiry of Netherlands Minister on behalf of Messrs. Dade and Hontkoper	118
186*	9,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Nadeschda" sold in England, as a British prize, to a Belgian subject. Refusal of Belgian Government to allow her to hoist Belgian flag. Should Belgian Government refuse right of entering its ports to duly documented British vessels, Her Majesty's Government must take the matter up. The "Nadeschda" cannot sail under British flag. Belgian law on subject of purchase of foreign vessels. Cannot advise application to Belgian Government on behalf of purchaser	118
187	11,	Law Officers	Case of the "Yonge Albert," a British prize, detained by Dutch authorities. As she has been released, there is nothing more to do	119
188	14,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the Danube. Disapproves egress being permitted to Austrian vessels. Should be captured first, and subsequently released. Unity of action necessary for Allies. Approves French suggestion that egress should be free, and ingress forbidden, to vessels of all nations	120
189	15,	Queen's Advocate	Prussian complaint of the search of a Prussian vessel off Memel by a British cruizer. Approving proposed answer to Prussian Minister (Answer annexed.)	121
190	28,	Queen's Advocate	Destruction of Messrs. Lewin's timber in attack on Uleaborg by British forces. Information supplied not authentic. To wait for Admiral's report. Claimants should not apply to Her Majesty's Government through solicitors	122
191	28,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of White Sea. Inclosing notification for London Gazette (Notification annexed.)	123
192	29,	Queen's Advocate	Purchase of Russian vessel "Adonis," at Barcelona, by M. Vidal (nationality not mentioned). He being domiciled at Barcelona, and "Adonis" sailing under Spanish colours, Her Majesty's Government cannot issue special directions in her favour. Circumstances open to suspicion	123
193	30,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Riga and other Russian Baltic ports. Affidavit proposed to be taken by Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, as to the date when it was publicly known to exist at Copenhagen. No objection	124
194	Oct. 5,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Baltic ports. Complaint of Dutch Minister of further notification. Should decline to discuss question. Government have a right to publish documents in proof of existence of blockades. Vessels once condemned cannot be restored. Proof necessary for condemnation	124
195	5,	Queen's Advocate	Inquiry of Hans Towns Consul-General as to intentions of Her Majesty's Government in view of divergence in English and French laws respecting liability to seizure of Russian vessels purchased after commencement of war. It is not the Government, but the Prize Court, which decides such questions. Such purchases are open to suspicion, and vessels would be sent for adjudication	125
196	5,	Queen's Advocate	Baltic blockade. Instructions to Consul Taylor to discover date when it was known at Copenhagen to exist. Consuls (from commercial connection) are not diligent in ascertaining these facts	126
197	5,	Queen's Advocate	Date of blockade of Riga. Calling attention to admission of Danish Consul at Riga that he knew of blockade on May 14. Very important. Should be communicated to Queen's Proctor (Declaration of Danish Consul annexed.)	126
198	6,	Queen's Advocate	Letters for Russian subjects detained at Hong Kong Post-office. Want copy of Governor of Hong Kong's Commission, &c.	127

No.	Date.		Subject.	Page
199	Oct. 10, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Contract at Berlin for supply of wire for Russian telegraphs. Part to be supplied from England. Cannot prohibit its export to Prussia. Might make strong representation to Prussian Government; or seize the wire, if it can be found, as enemy's property	128
200	12,	Queen's Advocate	Detention of two Dutch vessels off Sulina (see Nos. 159 and 171). No fresh evidence. Suggests that the vessels be restored	128
201	13,	Queen's Advocate	Information required by French Government as to purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects at neutral ports, and use of British flag before registration of the vessel. The purchase is legal; the use of flag before registration may be an infraction of English Municipal Law, but of this a Prize Court takes no notice. Her Majesty's Government may punish wrong-doers in such cases	129
202	14,	Queen's Advocate	Mecklenburg vessel, "Ostsee," captured for breach of blockade, and released by Prize Court. Claim of owners for costs. They have appealed, and Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere. Judgment of Dr. Lushington against practice of condemning captors in costs (Judgment annexed.)	130
203	14,	Queen's Advocate	Representation of French Government respecting purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects in neutral ports. "British Lion" should be seized, and legal proceedings instituted	131
204	14,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Lewin's property destroyed by British squadron at Uleaborg. No claim on Her Majesty's Government	131
205	16,	Queen's Advocate	Request of Hanoverian Government for restoration of Hanoverian vessel "Reinhard," captured for breach of blockade. Case is before Admiralty Court, and the suit cannot be abandoned upon an ex parte statement of persons interested	132
206	16,	Queen's Advocate and Solicitor-General	Mrs. M. Berg's query. British subjects remaining in Russia during war, if in army or navy, guilty of high treason; but if employed as professors of arts and sciences, not guilty of any offence against English law	132
207	19,	Queen's Advocate	Fictitious sales of Russian vessels to Lubeck citizens. Liable to capture if transferred after war was imminent. Consuls should supply dates of such sales	133
208	20,	Queen's Advocate	Fictitious sales of Greek vessels to Ionian subjects. As to power of Lord High Commissioner to refuse to grant sanitary papers. If that is the only check upon fraud, the Ionian laws should be altered	133
209	Nov. 1,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessels, "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alide," detained by British squadron off Sulina, and subsequently released. Irregular. Moderate compensation may be given	134
210	3,	Queen's Advocate	Raising of blockade of Gulf of Bothnia. Sending Notification for "Gazette" (Notification annexed.)	135
211	4,	Queen's Advocate	Danish Circular. Subjects of belligerent Powers who have become Danish subjects since commencement of war. Their vessels not entitled to Danish protection. Wishes to inform Queen's Proctor with reference to certain pending prize cases	135
212	8,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessels transferred to United States' citizens in neutral ports. As to what papers are necessary to constitute them United States' vessels. Evasive answers of United States' Attorney-General. Not desirable to discuss principles of international law with him. Difference of opinion between the Attorney-General and the Counsel to Her Majesty's Legation at Washington	136

213	Nov. 10, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Explanations respecting his Report of October 5 (No. 122). Dr. Deane's "Instructions" to Consul Taylor. The word was used in a legal sense. Substantiates his charges against Baltic Consuls for negligence in reporting on evasion of belligerent rights, fictitious sales, dates when blockades were known to exist, &c. Private merchants were better informed than Her Majesty's Government	137
214	13,	Queen's Advocate	Blockades. Notices communicated to foreign Ministers in London and Paris. Raising of blockades should be equally so communicated	141
215	16,	Queen's Advocate	Vessel building at Libau for M. Hogendyk, a Dutchman, contracted for in 1853, and partly paid for. She cannot now be brought out of port of Libau	142
216	19,	Queen's Advocate	Hanoverian Ministers appeal for release of Hanoverian vessel, "Reinhard," now before Prize Court. Must be left for decision of the Court. Documents pretended to exist are not forthcoming	142
217	20,	Queen's Advocate	Russian subject, Carl Anders Stinstrom, qualified to serve as mate on board a British vessel. No objection to his receiving necessary certificate	143
218	20,	Queen's Advocate	Claim of M. Radtchich to Tuscan nationality for his vessel the "Nicolas 1ère." Must decline, as he offers no proofs	144
219	21,	Queen's Advocate	Danish Circular to the effect that vessels belonging to subjects of belligerent Powers who have become Danes since commencement of war are not entitled to Danish protection. Ordinance of 1803 is to the same effect, but has been violated. Cases at present before Prize Court	144
220	22,	Queen's Advocate	Despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen respecting the date when the blockade of Russian Baltic ports was first known there. Remarks on failure to obtain necessary evidence of a fact which was known to all the North German ports	145
221	29,	Queen's Advocate	Transfer of ships from Russian to neutral flag at Messina, Facilities afforded by Danish Government for improper use of its flag	147
222	30,	Queen's Advocate	Expeditions fitted out in friendly States. As to seizure of neutral vessels conveying arms not intended for Queen's enemies. Reference to No. 47, on arms from Belgium for Turkish insurgents. (This Report has reference to expeditions fitting out in the United States against Cuba.)	147
223	30,	Queen's Proctor	Blockade of Riga. Wants evidence with reference to date	148
224	Dec. 1,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Riga. Evidence wanted with reference to date	148
225	1,	Queen's Proctor	Riga blockade, Consul Lousada is wanted to give evidence as to date, &c.	149
226	5,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea ports. Sends Notification. Names should be clearly stated. Has omitted Eupatoria and Balaklava, as they are in occupation of British troops. Recommends separate notices in the case of the principal ports, and that a separate vessel should be stationed off each. Fleet should communicate fact of blockade to neutral Consuls at ports to be blockaded (Notification annexed.)	149
227	7,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Riga, &c. As to dates when they were known in Copenhagen to exist. Remarkable ignorance displayed by Diplomatic and Consular officers. Sends extracts from Danish newspapers. (Newspaper extracts annexed.)	151
228	8,	Queen's Advocate	Company formed in Denmark for purchase of Russian ships. Wants further information than that supplied by French Government. Consuls have doubtless reported upon it	151

No.	Date.		Subject.	Page
229	Dec. 13, 1854	Queen's Advocate	Calling attention to fraudulent assumption of Mecklenburgh colours by Russian vessel "Ernst Menek." She has been condemned by Prize Court. Culpable misconduct of Mecklenburgh authorities in granting papers. Should remonstrate	152
230	13,	Queen's Advocate	Raising of Baltic blockade. Notification is necessary. Remarks as to dates named in Admiral's announcement. Has inserted two names which were given on the institution of the blockade (Notification annexed.)	152
232	16,	Queen's Advocate	Claim of Her Majesty's Consul at Antwerp to part of prize money in the case of the "San Spiridion," captured on his information. Prizes seized in British ports are property of the Sovereign in her office of Admiralty, and informants may be rewarded from proceeds. The same as to prizes captured at sea by revenue cruizers. Vessels captured at sea by Royal Navy are property of the captors, and informants cannot be rewarded out of proceeds. It would be expedient to offer rewards to Consuls for information leading to capture	154
233	16,	Queen's Advocate	Wants information as to Treaties between Great Britain and Denmark exempting vessels from confiscation for breaking blockades. Owners of Danish vessels are going to quote the Treaty before Prize Court	155
234	16,	Queen's Advocate	Same as above, with reference to Treaties between Great Britain and Sweden	155
235	19,	Queen's Advocate	Grain exported from Russian ports by merchants of Leghorn. Best remedy would be a rigorous blockade of Russian ports in Black Sea. No use warning Tuscan Government. Recommends blockade, without warning to any Government, except, perhaps, Austria, Delay in blockading Odessa, &c.	156
236	20,	Queen's Advocate	Billeting of Austrian soldiers on British subjects in Principalities. British owners of houses are on same footing as British tenants; but neither can claim to be treated differently from natives, except under Treaty stipulations	156
237	21,	Queen's Advocate	Hanoverian vessel, "Reinhard," before Prize Court. As to documents said to be inadvertently omitted to be handed in. They should be sent to Queen's Proctor	157
238	26,	Queen's Advocate	Russian subjects domiciled in Turkey, trading with England. Not considered an enemy if domiciled in Turkey, and his property not liable to capture. Moreover, recent Orders in Council permit trade with the enemy and protect enemy's goods on board neutral vessels	157
239	Jan. 8, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessels detained off Sulina by Her Majesty's cruizers. If they had contraband of war on board (as stated by Admiral) this excludes claim for compensation, and would have justified capture of vessels, irrespective of blockade. Answer to be returned to Netherlands Government	158
240	9,	Queen's Advocate	As to merchant vessels being furnished with passes to convey supplies from the Danube to the French army in the Crimea. Would such a course vitiate the blockade? Passes might vitiate it. Licences issued by the Sovereign are allowable. Belligerent Power might export its own property in its own transports	159
241	10,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the Black Sea ports. As to Eupatoria and Balaklava. Objections to a notice of simultaneous blockade instead of notifying blockade of each port as it occurs. Hopes blunders of Baltic blockade will not be repeated	160

242	Jan. 10, 1855	Queen's Advocate	As to Treaty right of Denmark and Sweden to a special warning in cases of blockade. Arguments used before Prize Court	161
243	13,	Law Officers	British subjects contracting to supply ships-of-war, &c., for Russia. They may be proceeded against for high treason. Those abroad might be warned by Proclamation that they will be prosecuted whenever within reach of British law	162
244	13,	Queen's Advocate	Danish society for purchase of Russian ships. Cannot recommend capture of the vessels on information supplied by Her Majesty's Minister and Consul. More particulars wanted. Discreditable conduct of Denmark with reference to fictitious sales of Russian ships. Great vigilance necessary as to all ships under Danish flag	162
245	13,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Herring's letter. Claim of persons at Liverpool against Russian Sea and River Insurance Company at St. Petersburgh. Her Majesty's Government cannot help them, and Russian Government not bound to pay	163
246	16,	Queen's Advocate	Contraband of war supplied to Russia through Prussia. Her Majesty's Government may remonstrate if such transit is illegal in Prussia. Legal advice should be taken. Ships bringing such articles might be captured on their way to Prussia	164
247	17,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Edmonds' request for information as to Russian Ukase prohibiting export of grain, &c., from Odessa. Not expedient to give him any answer	165
248	17,	Law Officers	Capture of Dutch vessel "Wilmina." Her Majesty's Government should pay sum claimed for wrongful detention at Pillau	166
249	18,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the Danube. Austrian proposal for relaxations in favour of neutral ports. Recommends issue of licences under Sign-Manual	166
250	18,	Queen's Advocate	Case of the "Steen Bille." His remarks in Admiralty Court, as reported in "Times," are correct, but for insertion of the word "not," &c. Report of speech annexed (containing somewhat insulting remarks on Denmark and the Danish Minister in London)	167
251	22,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Baltic; when known in Denmark to exist. Documents supplied by Danish Government are useless without dates	168
252	23,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Danube. Injury to neutral countries. France contends that a blockade may be partial. Suggests that French should undertake Danube blockade single-handed. Her Majesty's Government cannot control Prize Courts. Blockade may be limited to Kilia branch, if it can be isolated. Suggests issue of licences	168
253	23,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. C. and A. Giles' questions as to purchase of enemy's ships. Inexpedient to answer such questions. The purchases are legal, if bonâ fide	169
254	23,	Queen's Advocate	Fraudulent transfer of Russian and Greek vessels to Ionian flag. Ionian law wants altering. Her Majesty's Consuls may be instructed (as suggested by Lord High Commissioner) to refuse passes in certain cases, but Her Majesty's ships-of-war would not be justified in capturing in absence of suspicious circumstances	170
255	24,	Queen's Advocate	Wish of France to obtain supplies from the Danube for French forces in the Black Sea. As to blockade of the Kilia mouth of the Danube only. Imperial licences would not vitiate the blockade. As to passes. Her Majesty's Government cannot control decisions of Prize Court. A blockade is illegal if it reserves monopoly of trade to the blockading Power. Danube should be blockaded by France and Turkey only	171

256	Jan. 25, 1855	Law Officers	Detention of Russian letters by Postmaster at Hong Kong. Illegal, unless an Ordinance is passed conferring such power on the Governor	172
257	25,	Law Officers	British subjects contracting to supply ships-of-war to Russia, &c. Sends draft Proclamation, warning them of consequences (Proclamation annexed.)	172
258	25,	Queen's Advocate	Black Sea blockade. As to joint notification by British and French Admirals. Eupatoria and Balaklava are included. Difficulties may arise in Prize Courts from announcement of simultaneous blockade of all ports. Notice of blockade, when de facto established, will be necessary. Refers to Nos. 77, 226, and 241	173
259	27,	Queen's Advocate	Explanations respecting his remarks on Denmark and Danish Legation in the Prize Court in case of the "Steen Bille." Answer to objections of the Foreign Office (Documents annexed.)	174
260	29,	Queen's Advocate	Danube blockade. Proposed raising of. Should wait for information of raising before notifying in "Gazette." Sends draft notification (Draft notification annexed.)	181
261	31,	Queen's Advocate	Danish Company for purchase of Russian vessels. Further information discloses suspicious circumstances which would warrant capture of the vessels	182
262	Feb. 2,	Queen's Advocate	Remarks made by him before Prize Court on conduct of Danish Government and Legation. Quoting opinion of the Judge as to duplicity of Denmark	183
263	3,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea. Admiral's notice is insufficient and vague. Notice of intention to blockade is not legal. Serious consequences of inattention to his Memorandum on blockades prepared for the Admiralty	184
264	6,	Queen's Advocate	Notification of blockade of Black Sea. Sends Memorandum of instructions to Consuls as to their duties in connection with publishing the fact of a blockade, &c. (Memorandum annexed.)	185
265	12,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Odessa and Kertch. Notice sent on shore by flag of truce may be published in "Gazette," but formal "Gazette" notice will also be necessary. As to formalities required by law of France to make a blockade legal. Warning to individual vessels	186
266	16,	Queen's Advocate	Danish remonstrance against Order in Council respecting blockades, and pretence that blockade was not known in Denmark till June. Contrary has been proved in Court	187
267	17,	Queen's Advocate	As to neutrality of Ionian vessels. Wants information bearing on the subject	188
268	17,	Queen's Advocate	As to evidence given at Elsinore by Vice-Consul Larlham on question of existence of a blockade of Russian ports, that he had received no official notice of it. He should report on case (Evidence, &c., annexed.)	189
269	20,	Queen's Advocate	Intelligence of intended blockade of Black Sea. As to publication. The blockade must be notified when de facto established	191
270	20,	Queen's Advocate	Intended blockade of Kertch and Odessa. No remarks to make on report respecting	192
271	21,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea. No use notifying a prospective blockade when notice of its de facto establishment is hourly expected	192
272	21,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Odessa. Better wait for notification of its establishment before publishing notice given under flag of truce	193

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
273	Feb. 24, 1855	Law Officers ..	Contraband of war. Trade in, by Hans Towns, on account of Russia. Cannot capture when entering Hanseatic ports. Contraband depends on destination	193
274	28,	Queen's Advocate	Arms at Harburgh, suspected to be for Russia. Cannot demand their continued detention by Hanoverian Government, there being no legal proof	194
275	Mar. 1,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea ports. Sends notification for "Gazette," calling attention to Admiral's disregard of his Memorandum on Blockade .. .. (Notification annexed.)	194
276	3,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea ports. Reports of notices given under flag of truce may be published in "Gazette"	195
277	5,	Queen's Advocate	Cargo of rye at Eupatoria, belonging to Dutch merchants, Messrs. Kaars, Sypertryn, and Co. Dutch vessels may trade with Eupatoria. Cannot answer as to compensation in case of the rye having been used by allied armies, or in case of prohibited exportation	196
278	6,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessels detained off Sulina by British cruizers. Discrepancies between account of Admiral Dundas and that of the Netherlands Minister as to contraband of war being on board, &c. Advises compensation to owners	196
279	6,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea ports. Notification must be precise. Suggesting amendments, &c..	197
280	9,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea. Formal notification of British and French Admirals. No further notice need be published in "Gazette"	197
281	9,	Queen's Advocate	Raising of blockade of the Danube .. .. .. (Notification annexed.)	198
282	10,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea. Cannot publish naval despatch without notice to which it refers. Distinct information (if possessed) may be published in "Gazette," but not conjectures	199
283	14,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Black Sea. As to publication by Her Majesty's Consul at Lisbon of intended blockade. Intended blockade is not equivalent to actual blockade, but, as a rule, Consuls are right in publishing official documents relating to blockades .. .. (Announcement of prospective blockade annexed.)	199
284	17,	Queen's Advocate	As to Messrs. Evans, British subjects, machine manufacturers at Warsaw. May execute orders for Russian Government, if of an agricultural and commercial nature	200
285	19	Queen's Advocate	As to publication in Ionian Islands of notification of blockade of Black Sea ports..	201
286	22,	Queen's Advocate	Remonstrance of Netherlands Minister against Prize Court decision in case of the "Anechina Jantina." Inexpedient to embark in a legal discussion with a foreign Minister. Costs cannot be remitted. In consideration of the possibility of owners having been unable to countermand shipment, the cargo has been restored by the Court, on condition of the payment of the costs by owners.. .. .. (Judgment of Prize Court annexed.)	201
287	23,	Queen's Advocate	Days of grace allowed on the re-establishment of a blockade. Is a question of policy. No necessity for the indulgence. As to instructions respecting vessels which shipped their cargoes before the blockade	203
288	24,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Coronia's question. Vessels with Manchester goods, sugar, &c., may enter the Danube. Can't say whether they can proceed freely to Galatz and Ibraila	204

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
289	Mar. 26, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Cargo of rye at Eupatoria, belonging to Dutch merchants, Messrs. Kaars, Sypertryn, and Co. As to their indemnification in case it has been appropriated by the allied army. Seizure of all property in enemy's port not justified in all cases. If previously taken possession of by enemy, the case would be altered	204
290	—,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Odessa. Desirable to know terms of notice sent on shore under flag of truce..	205
291	27,	Law Officers ..	Transit of arms through Hans Towns to Prussia and Russia. Cannot prevent trade between neutrals, without proof that arms are intended for belligerents. May remonstrate with neutral States, and require them to enforce their laws, or to legislate for the purpose, if necessary. As to responsibility of the State for acts of its subjects. Also as to advisability of asserting a principle which may hereafter be turned against ourselves	205
292	28,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Sigrid," at Elsinore, made over to Mr. Walker, a British subject, in payment of debt. She may come to England for registration if transaction seems bonâ fide. Consul should report how she got to Elsinore	206
293	29,	Queen's Advocate	Black Sea blockade. Notice published at Malta. "London Gazette" notice should also be published there. Urges prompt notice of blockades	207
294	29,	Queen's Advocate	Black Sea blockade. Announcement in Ionian Islands. "London Gazette" notice should be published there. As to date when it was first known to exist	207
295	29,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Brown's question as to whether Russian subject in Turkey can sustain an action against a British subject in Turkey. If necessary to answer him, must have assistance of Law Officers	208
296	31,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessels detained off Sulina by British cruizers. Cannot refuse compensation. Information necessary for assessing damages. As to arbitration.	208
297	31,	Queen's Advocate	Queen's Proclamation, warning against assistance to the enemy. British subjects in Portugal may supply him with port wine notwithstanding	209
298	31,	Queen's Advocate	Circular to French Consuls in Principalities, announcing partial raising of Danube blockade. It having been entirely raised, the Circular should be counteracted	209
299	31,	Queen's Advocate	Baltic blockade. Refutation of Danish Minister's arguments as to its being unknown, &c. Notoriety of the blockade. Conduct of Danish Minister in pretending ignorance. As to fictitious sales of Russian ships to Danes	210
300	Apr. 9,	Queen's Advocate	Days of grace on re-establishment of Baltic blockade. Liability of all vessels to capture primâ facie. Naval officers not bound to capture when innocence is apparent	212
301	11,	Queen's Advocate	Queen's Proclamation against assisting the enemy. How does it affect Ionians, &c.? Wants assistance of Law Officers	213
302	11,	Queen's Advocate	Rye at Eupatoria, the property of widow Doorbosch, a Dutch subject. Her Majesty's Government cannot give information respecting. Onus of proof rests with claimant. Answer for Netherlands Minister	213
303	13,	Queen's Advocate	Dutch vessels arrived at Kertch in December 1854, and unavoidably detained. May be allowed to come out in ballast	214
304	16,	Queen's Advocate	Application on behalf of Rev. H. Hahn, a Russian, for passports to proceed, through England, to Cape of Good Hope. No legal objection, if bonâ fide; but cannot admit that "free passage is open to every servant of the Lord Jesus" in the case of Russian subjects. Calls attention to disturbed state of Caffre frontier of Cape Colony. ..	215

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
305	Apr. 16, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Revolvers at Hamburgh, supposed to be for Russia. Should apply to Hanoverian Government to stop them	215
306	21,	Queen's Advocate	Report of Danish and Swedish prize cases. Opinion of the Court that the vessels were not captured in violation of Treaties appealed to, although the Treaties are still in force. As to taking notice of Danish Minister's charge of violation of Treaties	216
307	21,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Odessa. Desirable to obtain copy of notice sent on shore under flag of truce, &c.	217
308	24,	Queen's Advocate	Telegram announcing blockade of coast of Courland. No dates given. Altogether too vague for publication in "Gazette." Urges necessity of accuracy	217
309	27,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of coast of Courland, Sends notification for "Gazette." Mistakes in names; serious consequences. As to whether Riga is included in notice, &c. (Notification annexed.)	218
310	28,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Courland. Misprint of date in "Gazette." Notice should be rectified	219
311	28,	Queen's Advocate	As to vessels of allies trading with enemy's unblockaded ports. Asks views of Her Majesty's Government, with reference to Order in Council, for his guidance in Prize Court cases	219
312	May 1,	Queen's Advocate	As to egress from Russian ports after re-establishment of blockade. As to object of Danish Minister in asking such questions: to be used against us hereafter. Vessels entering ports flagrante bello not entitled to consideration. Conduct of Denmark gives her no claim to indulgence. Naval officers capture at their own risk, and not obliged to capture everything. As to advisability of telling Danish Minister	220
313	2,	Queen's Advocate	Inquiries of Netherlands Minister respecting egress from Russian ports after re-establishment of blockade. No days of grace allowed. Capture of neutrals in ballast is exceptional. Vessels with cargoes must be sent home for adjudication. Netherlands behaves more creditably than Denmark in matters of blockade	221
314	3,	Queen's Advocate	Mr. Rothery's request for issue of instructions to Consuls to administer oaths for affidavits to be produced in Prize Courts. No objection, but they usually do so already. There may have been some special difficulty in Mr. Rothery's case	222
315	3,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Hebe" transferred to Lubeck flag. Suspicious transfer. She might have been captured when searched last year. Captor would run risk in capturing her now; but if Her Majesty's Government ordered her capture, and indemnified the captor, she might turn out a good prize	223
316	4,	Queen's Advocate	Vessels owned by a Swedish Company in which there are Russian shareholders. Not liable to capture	223
317	5,	Queen's Advocate	Evidence given in Danish Court by British Vice-Consul against British Crown. Mr. Larlham's explanation satisfactory, but he should have told Foreign Office first, so as to obviate consequences	224
318	7,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Sigrid," lying at Elsinore, transferred to British subject (Mr. Walker) for debt. No objection to her coming to England for registration, if French Government concur; but there is no proof of the bonâ fides of the transfer. Doubts expediency of Her Majesty's Government countenancing a transaction which would, if occurring in England, be subject to investigation in a Prize Court	224
319	8,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Finland. As to fresh notification by Admiral Dundas to supersede that made by Captain Watson. Should be stopped, former one having been already acted on. Ships should cruize just inside the Sound, to warn vessels proceeding eastward	225

320	May 8, 1855	Law Officers	French Decree ordering search of all foreign vessels leaving Havre, for discovery of deserters and persons liable to conscription, &c. No grounds for protesting against it	226
321	10,	Law Officers	Queen's Proclamation against assisting the enemy. How does it affect Ionians? Status of an Ionian is different from status of a British subject. He is not liable to be proceeded against for infraction of Proclamation, but may be deprived of British protection	226
322	14,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessel "Hebe" transferred to Lubeck flag. Adheres to opinion in No. 215. Capture legally justifiable, but a little risky for the captor	227
323	15,	Queen's Advocate	Russian vessels transferred to Norwegian subjects, exposed to annoyance on arriving in England. Complaint of Norwegian Minister. Cases must be investigated to prevent necessity of sending the vessels before a Prize Court. Cannot exempt Norwegian ships	227
324	17,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Finland. Sends notification for "Gazette." As to mentioning name of Emperor of French when no French ships take part in blockade (Notification annexed.)	228
325	23,	Queen's Advocate	Baltic blockade. Steps taken to publish at Copenhagen. Her Majesty's Consuls must be prepared to prove knowledge of the blockade in Denmark, in case of future necessity	229
326	24,	Law Officers	300 cases of muskets shipped from Flushing in Hamburgh vessel "Otto," for Para, but suspected to be for Russia. As to establishing principles which may be turned against ourselves. "Otto" should be searched at sea, and captured if acting suspiciously. General maxim: neutrals, with contraband of war, when suspected to be for enemy, liable to capture. Cruizers should be stationed off Netherlands, &c., to examine vessels. What are suspicious circumstances. Her Majesty's Government should indemnify captors	229
327	26,	Queen's Advocate	Vessels under Moldavian and Wallachian flag, suspected to belong to Russia. May properly be captured on high seas; if in Turkish jurisdiction, Turkish permission must be obtained. (Decision of Prize Court that Ionian vessels are to be considered as neutrals)	231
328	31,	Queen's Advocate	Vice-Consul Blackwell's list of Lubeck vessels which were transferred to Russian flag during Danish war, and re-transferred at its conclusion. Case of the "Phœnix." Not liable to capture for having once sailed under Russian flag. Necessity for vigilance	231
329	June 2,	Queen's Advocate	Transit of arms through Hanover for Russia. Agent proceeded against; discharged for want of proof. May call upon Hanoverian Government to take steps to prevent transit of arms. Unsatisfactory to be put off with excuses of want of proof, &c. Reference to case of the "Otto" (No. 326)	232
330	2,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Odessa. Notice sent on shore by Captain Broke. No further "Gazette" notice necessary	233
331	4,	Queen's Advocate	Capture of the "Otto and Olaf," coming out of Riga. M. Wehner's protest against. Cargo unloaded for crossing the bar. Captured after the institution of the blockade. Cannot accede to demand for release. Would prejudice case before Prize Court on question of costs, &c.	233
332	5,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of White Sea. Whether notice of September 1854 is still in force. Prize Court might consider blockade raised	234
333	7,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Finland. Further notification. Introduction of name of Emperor of the French, &c. (Notification annexed)	234

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
334	June 7, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Proposed communication to Danish Government respecting treatment of vessels coming out of blockaded ports. Rejects French amendments. Capture of all vessels from blockaded ports is a principle of international law, not of British prize law	235
335	12,	Queen's Advocate	Capture of Danish vessel "Dania." Will decide on course when he sees papers	236
336	16,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Finland. French objections to a second notification. Reasons why necessary, As to legal effect on ports in a gulf of blockade of entrance to the gulf	236
337	21,	Queen's Advocate	Danish vessels captured. Cargoes reloaded to cross the bar. M. Wehner's "Otto and Olaf." Danish Minister's request for her release. She is a Russian transferred ship. Cargo may be restored, but not ship	237
338	26,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Bothnia. Notification of (Notification annexed.)	238
339	28	Queen's Advocate	Seizure of Austrian vessel "Nina" at Ipswich. Formerly Russian, owned and commanded as at present. Suspicious. Must leave to decision of Prize Court	239
340	30,	Queen's Advocate	Time allowed by Russian Government to British vessels to clear out after war began. Mr. Ellis's inquiry. Should decline to answer	239
341	30,	Queen's Advocate	Danish vessel "Dania." Restored, with cargo. Costs pending. Costs should not be sued for in cases of restoration. As to suggesting this to foreign Ministers who claim release of vessels	240
342	July 2,	Queen's Advocate	M. Wienholt's saltpetre, exported to Portugal and re-exported to Hamburgh; captured and condemned in French Prize Court. His protest. Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere. Interference with Prize Court of an ally only allowable in very exceptional cases	240
343	4,	Queen's Advocate	Netherlands vessels "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alida," detained in Black Sea by Her Majesty's cruizers. Compensation to owners. Netherlands Government should demand fixed sum, supported by vouchers. Cannot consider claim without proper vouchers and particulars	241
344	5,	Queen's Advocate	As to restoring Danish prize "Otto and Olaf." Number of Russian vessels under Danish flag. Danish Government take no steps to prevent abuse of their flag. Crown has power to restore, if it pleases, but should stipulate for costs	242
345	10,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Nina" seized at Ipswich, on suspicion of being Russian. Can't alter previous opinion on evidence produced. (See No. 339)	243
346	11,	Queen's Advocate	The "Gefion," built in Russia for a Swedish merchant, and now at Christiania. Was built flagrante bello, &c. Cannot comply with request of Netherlands Minister (? for guarantee against capture on leaving Christiania)	243
347	13,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of the White Sea. Sends notification. Has inserted name of Emperor of the French (Notification annexed.)	244
348	13,	Queen's Advocate	Danish vessel "Otto and Olaf." Judgment of Prize Court. Cargo restored. More evidence necessary as to the vessel. Requests that further information may be obtained, but not through Danish authorities (Judgment, &c., annexed.)	245
349	13,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Nina." Papers wanted	248

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
350	July 21, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Case of the "Gefion," built in Russia, and sold to a Swedish merchant. As to allowing her to leave Christiania with a guarantee against capture. Such transfers, though not absolutely illegal, are suspicious. Leaving port after raising of blockade not illegal, but not to be encouraged. Onus of proof of bona fides is on the "Gefion." Cannot recommend guarantee against capture. Large number of fraudulent transfers in consequence of flag covering cargo. As to special exception being made in present case	248
351	23,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Nina" seized at Ipswich. Austrian demand for restoration on ground of correctness of papers. Papers not sufficient evidence. Cannot recommend restoration or indemnity, except as a special favour. Ownership doubtful. Formerly Russian. No bill of sale. When Russian, was commanded by her present master, who knows nothing of her sale. She will probably be condemned	249
352	25,	Queen's Advocate	Blockade of Gulf of Bothnia. Sending notification for "Gazette." Presumes it is de facto (Notification annexed.)	251
353	28,	Queen's Advocate	As to answer to Danish Minister respecting costs when prizes are restored. Prize Court has decided in favour of right to capture vessels without risk of costs or damages. Capture of "Dania" was legal. Illegal to come out of a blockaded port with cargo. Restoration does not prove illegality of capture. When there is deterioration of cargo, immediate sale is allowable. Captors are best judges as to restoration. Course Her Majesty's Government would pursue in similar case. Belligerent right to capture all ships coming out of blockaded ports. Exemptions may be granted as favours	252
354	30,	Queen's Advocate	Greek vessels captured off the Danube for breach of blockade. If not already restored, case should be investigated at Constantinople	253
355	Aug. 14,	Queen's Advocate and Attorney-General	Firing on a flag of truce and capture of boat's crew of Her Majesty's ship "Cossack" by the Russians. As to right to detain them as prisoners of war. Flag of truce not bound to wait until acknowledged. No right to attack unarmed party. But as the boat's crew overstepped the object of the flag of truce, they cannot claim to be released	253
355*	15,	Queen's Advocate	Messrs. Wienholt and Wehner's saltpetre reshipped at Lisbon for Hamburgh, and condemned by a French Prize Court. Conduct suspicious. Her Majesty's Government cannot support appeal	255
356	19,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Nina." Condemned as prize. As to making a representation on the subject to Austrian Government (Judgment annexed.)	256
357	20,	Queen's Advocate	Mathieson and Ritter's claim. Timber destroyed at Uleaborg by Her Majesty's forces. No proof of ownership, or steps taken to distinguish from Russian property	259
358	Sept. 4,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Anna Maria," captured in Sea of Azov. No ground for release. She had no right to leave Kertch while blockaded, unless in ballast. Suspicious aspect of case. No colours or papers	259
359	8,	Queen's Advocate	Greek vessels "Chriseis" and "Aspis," captured while breaking blockade near Odessa. Cannot be released without further information. Suspicious circumstances. Actuary at Constantinople must decide as to their restoration	260
360	14,	Queen's Advocate	May Austrian merchant at Trieste send neutral vessels to Russian ports to fetch corn bought before the war? Only by special licence, with concurrence of France. Information not sufficient. No grounds for allowing	261
361	13,	Queen's Advocate	Capture of Netherlands vessels "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alida." Compensation. Translations wanted	261
362	15,	Queen's Advocate	French law. French vessels cannot be bought by any but French subjects. No such law in England	262

No.	Date.		SUBJECT.	Page
363	Sept. 17, 1855	Queen's Advocate	Shipment of arms at Boston, in American vessels, for Russian Government. Purchase of saltpetre at Calcutta. Neutral State to whom consigned may be required to prevent its reaching Russia. Arms, &c., concealed in bales of cotton. Vessel may be visited, but with considerable risk to captor. Her Majesty's Government may take the risk. Contraband of war may be carried to neutral ports. Capture must be justified by suspicion. Captors may not bring evidence. Sensitiveness of United States	262
364	Oct. 2,	Queen's Advocate	Insertion of owners' names in passes of Danish vessels. No Danish vessel seized for its omission, but proof required that vessels were not Russian property. Abuse of Danish flag	263
365	13,	Queen's Advocate	Vessel chartered at Rotterdam to convey sulphur to Hamburgh. Cannot be stopped	264
366	13,	Queen's Advocate	Sulphur at Rotterdam; at Hamburgh packed in sugar boxes. If falsely described, it alters complexion of case	265
367	25,	Queen's Advocate	Netherlands vessels "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alida" detained in Black Sea by Her Majesty's cruizers. Compensation. Claim for freight for return journey inadmissible. Could not have returned through blockade with cargo. Loss of freight not occasioned by detention. Claim for demurrage excessive. Suggests arbitration or reference to experienced person	265
368	25,	Queen's Advocate	Austrian vessel "Nina." Appeal against decision of Prize Court. Case is sub judice, and must not be discussed with Austrian Minister. Plea that her papers were Austrian. Opinion of claimant's counsel. Justifiable seizure. Grounds of suspicion. Case turns on facts as to nationality	266
369	Nov. 8,	Queen's Advocate	Transfer of Russian vessel to an American. As to British Consular certificate of. May she be resold by American to British subject, and obtain British register. Consuls must not certify to transfers. As to papers necessary for an American ship	267
370	21,	Queen's Advocate	Raising of blockade of White Sea. Communicate notice to French Government before inserting in "Gazette" (Notification annexed.)	268
371	23,	Queen's Advocate	Netherlands ships "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alida" detained in Black Sea by British cruizers. As to assessing compensation to owners. Question of account and mercantile usage. Suggests sum to be offered. Rule for payment of costs of reference	269

LAW OFFICERS' REPORTS, ON QUESTIONS ARISING OUT OF THE CRIMEAN WAR.

No. 1.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received October 3.)

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, October 3, 1853.

Russian property on board British vessel bound for St. Petersburgh. Declaration will not prevent capture.

I AM favoured with Mr. Addington's letter of the 23rd September, transmitting a letter from Mr. Duncan, who requests to be informed whether property shipped as Russian on board a British steam-vessel bound for St. Petersburgh would be exempt from the consequences of capture in case of war; Mr. Addington requests that I would inform your Lordship at my earliest convenience what answer should be returned to the applicant.

I have accordingly taken Mr. Duncan's letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the measure he proposes to adopt, viz., the insertion in the bills of lading of the words "Russian property," or "all the property of Russian subjects," will not exempt goods on board a British steam-vessel from the consequences of capture in the event of war, and that an answer (in the negative) should be accordingly returned to the applicant in this case.

Russian troops billeted on British and Ionian subjects at Galatz.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Sir Hamilton Seymour, inclosing a note from Count Nesselrode in reply to a representation which Sir Hamilton Seymour has been instructed to make on the part of Her Majesty's Government on the subject of the proceedings of the Russian authorities at Galatz in quartering troops on British and Ionian subjects at that place.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience as to rights of this kind, and the practice usually adopted by belligerents.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am not aware that any special or particular international practice has ever existed upon this subject, and that I am of opinion, that on general principles, and in the absence of express stipulations, foreigners domiciled in a country which is subjected to military occupation cannot, as a matter of right, insist upon any general exemption, from having troops quartered upon them in the same manner and proportion, and subject to the same regulations as natives. Any concession in favour of foreigners must be rather a matter of such comity or favour as may not unreasonably be expected at the hands of a friendly Power, than of strict right.

Treatment of neutral property on enemies' vessels.

I AM honoured by your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 18th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Sir Hamilton Seymour, inclosing a notice of the Russian Minister of Finance, published in the "St. Petersburgh Journal," relative to the treatment of Turkish vessels and their cargoes in the ports of Russia or met with at sea by Russian cruizers, after the term granted for their free departure from Russian ports; and in reference to the particular passage marked in the printed notice, which states that Turkish merchant-vessels and their cargoes shall, if captured, be considered as lawful prizes, even should such cargoes be the property of friendly Powers; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that I would take this paper into consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience as to the practice usually followed in such cases.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration and have the honour to report—

That I am unable to explain fully the practice usually followed in cases of neutral property captured by a belligerent on board an enemy's vessel without far exceeding the ordinary limits of a report. I will endeavour to state as succinctly as the nature of the question will admit, the progress and present state of international law on the subject.

I am of opinion that the practice of the most enlightened and powerful maritime nations, founded upon clear and intelligible principles and supported by the highest authorities, is decidedly in favour of restoring neutral property captured in an enemy's unarmed merchant-ship upon clear and strict proof being given by the claimant of its neutral character.

This principle of international law must, in my opinion, be now considered as established, although the practice of all nations has not been uniform or consistent on the point. Of its vital importance to all commercial countries, and of the serious consequences to them of allowing it to be departed from by any belligerent maritime Power, I need not speak. This principle is distinctly enunciated in the "Consolato de Mare," the earliest Maritime International Code existing; see the passage in Pardessus "Coll. des Lois Maritimes," vol. 2, p. 303, who observes thereon (note)—"Il suffit de reconnaître que, d'après les législations et les usages dont le Consulat a été formé ou avait admis pour principe que la marchandise de l'ennemi, chargé sur un navire ami, était de bonne prise, et que la marchandise d'ami, quoique chargé sur un navire ennemi, devait être respectée." After quoting several ancient Treaties in which it was to be found, he adds (with great truth)—"Ce principe a souvent été modifié par des Traités, et plus souvent par l'usage et la force." See also on the same passage in the "Consolato del Mare," Grotius de J. B. and P., Lib. 3, cap 1, sec. 5, (in notis) and see on the same point, Grotius de J. B. and P., Lib. 3, cap. 6, secs. 5 and 6, who correctly states that all property in enemy's ships is presumed primâ facie to be enemy's property, but that the contrary may be established by proof. Bynkershoek, Quest. Jus. Pub., Lib. 1, cap. 113, ably and concisely discusses the point whilst quoting several Treaties, in which the contrary principle had been enunciated clearly, and, in my humble opinion, incontrovertibly establishes that, in the absence of stipulations, the general principle must be in favour of the neutral, who may justly say to his captor, "Cape, si potes, quodcumque est hostis tui, sed mihi redde quod meum est quia amicus tuus sum et impositione rerum mearum nihil sum molitus in necem tuam."

Heineccius, who wrote expressly on the very question in his "Exercitatio VIII de navibus ob vecturam velilarum mercium commissis," cap. 2, secs. 8 and 9, states the correct principle and practice to be precisely as now settled in opposition to what he describes as "inhumanios illarum gentium consuetudo quâ navi hostili captâ res hostium et amicorum juxta in prœdam cedere capientibus judicantur."

Hubner, when on a special mission from Denmark to England and France on this question, ably maintained the same doctrine in his treatise, "De la saisie des bâtiments neutres."

Vattel, book 3, cap. 7, sec. 116, distinctly says that the effects of neutrals found in an enemy's ship are to be restored to the owner, against whom there is no right of confiscation.

England has resolutely maintained and acted upon this principle and under circumstances when it would have been greatly to her interest to have deviated from it. Thus the Report of the Commissioners, 18th January, 1753 (on the Prussian captures) expressly states "That the law of nations has established that the lawful goods of a friend on board the ship of an enemy ought to be restored." Thus Lord Stowell in the case of the "Fanny," 1 Dodson's Admiralty Reports, p. 448, says "a neutral subject is at liberty to put his goods on board a merchant-vessel though belonging to a belligerent, subject, nevertheless, to the rights of the enemy who may capture the vessel, but who has no right according to the modern practice of civilized States to condemn the neutral property." And see the memorable judgment of the Court of King's Bench, pronounced by Lord Ellenborough in Barker v. Blakes, 9 East's Reports, p. 291. This right has been permitted by English Courts to be extended to natural born British subjects domiciled in a foreign (neutral) country and thence trading with enemies of England; (a species of commerce highly obnoxious to our national interests and sentiments, and the legality of which could only be supported by the strictest adherence to the principle in question) see Bell v. Reid, 1 Maule and Selwyn's Reports, 726. The United States of America have strictly adhered to and enforced the principle. In the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the "Nereide," delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, as reported in 9 Cranche's Report, p. 412, is to be found (particularly at p. 419) the most able and concise statement and reasoning on the point with which I am acquainted; he states (at p. 433)—"Every writer on international law acknowledges the right of the neutral to transport his goods in a hostile bottom. Every civilized nation, with the exception of Spain, has acknowledged the existence of this right, unless it be relinquished by express stipulation."

General doctrine.

Mr. Justice Story (a writer of the very highest authority on International Law) in the same case says (page 437): "The general doctrine, though subject to many learned doubts, is now incontrovertibly established that neutral goods may be lawfully put on board of an enemy ship without being prize of war."

To this great concurrence of authority it must be admitted that there are several instances in which particular nations have, either by Treaty inter se; or by express enactment, adopted and acted on a contrary rule. France, for instance, has done so from very early times by various Ordinances, especially by that of Louis XIV in 1681, but it would seem that she has not been strictly consistent, and, that from 1650 to 1681, she admitted the principle now contended for. (See "Wheaton's Elements of International Law," Part 4, c. 3, s. 18.)

Doctrine as to "free ships" making "free goods."

Many countries have at various times renounced their neutral rights and agreed inter se that "free ships" should make "free goods" and "enemy's ships" "enemy's goods." Such Treaties are, in my opinion, to be viewed as exceptions to the common and general rule of International Law which must prevail in their absence.

It was well observed by the British Commissioners in 1753, "that particular Treaties have inverted the rule of the Law of Nations," and by agreement "declared the goods of a friend on board the ship of an enemy to be prize."

It has also been contended that those countries which by express enactment, or stipulation, adopt the principle that free ships make free goods acquire thereby an inherent right (without express stipulation) to adopt the converse rule, "enemy's ships make enemy's goods."

In my opinion this doctrine cannot be maintained, and is unanswerably refuted by Chief Justice Marshall in his judgment in the case of the "Neride" above referred to (9 Cranch), and see the "Cygnet," 2 Dodson's Admiralty Reports, p. 299, decided by Lord Stowell to the same purport.

With respect to the Northern Powers, I do not find that on either of the occasions of their armed neutralities (in 1780 and 1801) this question was directly discussed. They contended, and Great Britain denied, that "free ships make free goods," but I do not find that they denied the freedom of neutral goods in enemy's ships, and it would not have been to their interest so to do.

The principle of the armed neutrality (that free ships make free goods) seems to have been expressly relinquished by Russia by the Convention with Great Britain, signed at St. Petersburgh in 1801, and acceded to subsequently by Denmark and Sweden.

In 1807 Russia annulled this Convention, and declared that she returned to the principles of the armed neutrality. Since this date I cannot find that any communication has passed between Great Britain and Russia on the subject of neutral property.

I have already endeavoured to point out that the principles of the armed neutrality do not conflict with that in question.

I may mention that I have had the advantage of perusing a very learned and useful manuscript memorandum on this subject recently compiled by my friend and brother Advocate, Dr. Deane, which would doubtless be at your Lordship's service if required.

Burden of proof thrown on the neutral.

I would beg to point out that the Law of Nations clearly authorizes the capture of all hostile vessels; that their cargoes are primâ facie hostile; and that the burden of proof is thrown upon the neutral; and that in the absence of such proof, neutral property may not only be captured, but also lawfully condemned by the Prize Courts of the captor's country.

I would also suggest the expediency of giving immediate public notice of this "avis au commerce" of the Russian Minister of Finance, in order to warn all Her Majesty's subjects of the risk they will incur by embarking their property in Turkish vessels; such notice might be accompanied by a statement that "Her Majesty in concert with her allies would not fail to direct urgent representations to be made to the Russian Government on the subject," or by any similar statement (by way of protest) at your Lordship's discretion. I shall, I trust, be pardoned for further adverting:—

1. To the expediency of obtaining (if possible) a declaration from Turkey exempting neutral property on board Russian ships from condemnation "in strict accordance with the principles of International Law," or to that effect.

2. To the necessity of obtaining some knowledge of the nature and constitution of the Russian Prize Courts, by which alone the Maritime Law of Nations can be legally administered, especially as regards neutrals, and without which capture will always be followed by confiscation.

3. To the expediency of joint action and combination on the part of all the maritime and commercial Powers, some of these as Greece and Belgium, are not embarrassed by any adverse or inconsistent precedents or usage, and all are vitally interested in maintaining the principle that neutral property cannot be lawfully confiscated simply by reason of its being found by one belligerent in the unarmed merchant vessel of another.

My Lord,

Warlike stores for Russia concealed in British vessels at Constantinople. Export from England not illegal.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, respecting a report that warlike stores destined for Russia have arrived at Constantinople, concealed under cargoes of coal in British ships freighted for Russian ports in the Black Sea.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take this matter into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion whether the exportation of such stores, under the circumstances stated by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, would be illegal, England not being at war with Russia.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am of opinion that the exportation of the articles in question (steam machinery and guns) to Russia is not at present illegal. If, however, your Lordship should desire to be informed whether any, and what, measures can legally be adopted to prevent or regulate such exportation, I must request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General.

Protection.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the draft of a letter which your Lordship proposes to address to Messrs. Maples, Maples, and Pearse, in answer to an application from them made under the circumstances set forth in the inclosed papers, with the view of obtaining protection from the hostile interference of the Porte for certain Russian vessels chartered by British subjects, and to request that I would take this draft into consideration, and report, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to whether a letter in such terms may properly be addressed to the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this draft into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have ventured to suggest some alterations in pencil, for the purpose of making the letter in question more strictly correct.

That, with reference to my report of the 22nd ultimo, I would venture to suggest the expediency of acquiring some information as to the course likely to be pursued by Turkey, as well as by Russia, with respect to neutral ships, and neutral property in enemy's ships, and especially as to the existence and regulations of any tribunal in Turkey, analogous to the Prize Courts of other nations.

*Draft of Letter to Messrs. Maples, Maples, and Pearse.

Foreign Office, December 3, 1853.

Gentlemen,

I AM directed by the Earl of Clarendon to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant; and I am to state to you, in reply, that his Lordship regrets that he is unable to furnish you with the names of the vessels on behalf of which, on the representation of Mr. James Clay, instructions have been sent to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, as stated to you in my letter of the 30th ultimo; the certificate relating to those vessels, which was signed and sealed by the Ottoman Consul at Hull, having been forwarded to Constantinople.

Lord Clarendon will send to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe a copy of your letter and of the list annexed to it, with instructions to use his best efforts for the protection of British interests; but his Lordship cannot hold out any certain assurance to the British charterers either of the vessels which form the subject of your letter, or of those to which Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe's attention has already been called, as to the manner in which the Porte my exercise its belligerent rights.

I am, &c.

British subject captured on board merchant-ship treated as prisoner of war.

My Lord,

WITH reference to Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 10th instant, in which his Lordship incloses a despatch from Mr. Yeames, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa, and requests me to report to your Lordship whether a British subject serving on board a captured merchant vessel can lawfully be treated as a prisoner of war, I have the honour to request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, and, further, to be informed what has been the practice of England in this respect in times of war as to subjects of neutral States taken on board hostile merchant ships, which information can, I apprehend, be obtained from the Admiralty.

British subjects captured on board Turkish merchant-ship and ship of war. Former should be released, &c.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the inclosed despatch from Mr. Yeames, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa, reporting that two English engineers who were serving, the one on board an Egyptian war steamer, the other on board a Turkish merchant steamer, when those two vessels were captured by a Russian ship, will be treated as prisoners of war; and to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion whether a British subject serving on board a captured merchant vessel can lawfully be treated as a prisoner of war.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are of opinion that on general principles of international law the subjects of a neutral Power serving on board an unarmed merchant vessel of a belligerent are entitled to claim to be released by the captors on satisfactorily establishing their nationality and peaceable character; at all events, if they engaged to serve on board such vessel before the war had commenced. We would suggest, however, that it will be desirable to ascertain what has been the practice of Great Britain in this respect, particularly as regards Russian seamen captured under similar circumstances during the last general war, before making any direct official demand upon the Government of Russia.

British subjects captured on board Turkish merchant ships.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 29th ultimo, stating that, with reference to our report of the 16th on the subject of the question whether British subjects who may be captured by Russian ships of war while serving on board unarmed Turkish merchant vessels are liable to be treated as prisoners of war, he was directed to transmit to us a further despatch which had been received from Mr. Yeames, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Odessa, reporting that, among other prisoners, two English engineers and some Maltese and Ionian subjects, who were taken on board a Turkish merchant steam vessel, have arrived at Odessa, and that they are about to be sent into the interior of the country as prisoners of war.

British subjects captured on board man-of-war.

Mr. Addington is pleased to request that we would take this despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, whether, on principles of international law or usage, Her Majesty's Government would be justified in demanding from the Russian Government the release of these British and Ionian subjects, more particularly since it appears that they were captured by a Russian ship of war on the 30th October last, whilst the notice from the Russian Finance Department (an extract from which is contained in Mr. Yeames' despatch) stated that no Turkish merchant ships would be captured by Russian vessels before November 22.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are of opinion that, on principles of international law, Her Majesty's Government would be justified in demanding from the Russian Government the release of these British and Ionian subjects, with the exception of Mr. Bell, who, having been captured whilst serving on board a Turkish vessel of war, cannot, in the absence of any special circumstances, claim the intervention of Her Majesty's Government.

We have, &c.

Treaties with Russia.

My Lord,

WITH reference to the case of Mr. Huddlestone, and other similar cases, I must request to be informed, as promptly as convenient, what Treaties and Conventions are now actually in existence between this country and Russia, and to be referred to or furnished with copies of them in extenso.

I find the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation signed at St. Petersburgh, January 11, 1843, in vol. 6, Hertslet, p. 762, and the Treaty of Arebro, in Hertslet's State Papers, vol. 1, part 1, page 13, and I presume that these two are the only existing Treaties, except specific Conventions as to Slave Trade, &c.

Neutrality of Sweden and Denmark in case of war.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 4th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two identic notes which have been delivered to him by the Representatives of Sweden and Denmark, announcing the policy which the two countries have agreed to adopt in the event of war; and to request that I would take these notes into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, whether in my opinion anything is wanting in these notes to constitute complete neutrality, and that I would at the same time report to your Lordship any general remarks I may have to offer on the subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I do not observe anything is wanting in these notes to constitute complete neutrality according to international law.

That, agreeably to your Lordship's request, I would venture to remark generally thereupon—

Belligerent vessels in neutral ports.

1. That the proposed admission of the ships of war of both belligerents into the harbours of these neutral countries is open to this observation, viz., that the practical effect of this will be that such harbours when fortified, e.g., Copenhagen, will (in effect) prove an asylum and protection for the fleets or vessels of that belligerent Power which may first enter, and which cannot be attacked therein with impunity; but that such neutral harbours, when undefended by fortifications, will not in practice protect the vessels of one belligerent from the attacks of those of the other, although legally the limit of three miles from the shore ought to protect them.

Three-mile limit.

Interdicted ports.

2. That there may possibly be some harbours, the entry into which being either interdicted or permitted to both parties, may operate greatly to the advantage of one belligerent and to the detriment of the other, for topographical or military reasons, and that in this view it is possible that some alterations in the list of interdicted harbours may be usefully suggested. I would venture, with the utmost diffidence, to suggest whether (for instance) a Russian fleet by getting first into Copenhagen (which is not an interdicted harbour) might not thereby obtain a decisive or most important advantage, as by making it impossible for Her Majesty's ships to enter or quit the Baltic without great danger, and if so, whether the Danish Government might not be induced to interdict Copenhagen to both parties. These, however, are political and military rather than legal questions, and beyond my province, and it is quite possible that the practical result may be in favour of Great Britain.

Contraband of war.

3. It may be expedient to come to some more distinct understanding as to what articles are meant to be included in the term contraband of war. For want of this, cargoes of an ambiguous nature, as timber and coal (for instance), may under certain circumstances cause much difficulty. I observe that such articles were enumerated in an explanatory Article or Declaration signed at Copenhagen, 4th July, 1780, and renewed in Article VII of the Treaty of Kiel, 1814 (1 Hertslet, p. 203).

4. The interdiction as regards privateers, though somewhat novel, is not, I presume, deemed objectionable as being prejudicial to British, or favourable to Russian, interests.

As to flag covering cargo.

5. It is possible that under the words of the Vth Article—"toute sureté et toute facilité pour les navires Danois, Suedois, et Norvégiens, avec leurs cargaisons"—some attempt may be made to contend that "the flag covers the cargo," or even to reopen the point (formerly so much disputed) as to the right of searching neutrals when under convoy. If there be any such idea, some declaration on the part of Her Majesty's Government would be advisable.

I need not, perhaps, at present further advert to such eventualities, nor do more than refer to my report dated November 22nd, 1853 (on the notice from the Russian Finance Minister), especially to the conclusion of that report, and to the very different practice which it is probable will be adopted by Russia and Great Britain as to neutral goods when captured on board unarmed merchant-vessels of a belligerent, with a view to entering into some such common course of action with other neutral Powers as I have therein ventured to suggest, and for which these identic notes may possibly afford a favourable opportunity.

My Lord,

J. Robertson, born in Poland of British parents, serving in Russian army.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 9th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the inclosed despatch from Colonel Du Plat, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Warsaw, respecting the enlistment in the Russian army of one James Robertson, born in the Kingdom of Poland of British parents, in wedlock, and who has on different occasions claimed and enjoyed the rights and privileges of a British born subject of the British crown; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion upon this case; and especially with respect to the last paragraph of Colonel Du Plat's despatch, wherein he states that he has been given to understand that James Robertson had waived his rights as a British subject, and had voluntarily enlisted in the Russian service, your Lordship would be glad to know what instructions it may be proper to give to Colonel du Plat in answer to his inquiry as to the steps which he should take to vindicate the allegiance due to Her Majesty under the circumstances described.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That if James Robertson has been unwillingly compelled to serve as a Russian soldier, the course which Her Majesty's Consul-General proposes to pursue in order to claim and insist upon his liberation and exemption appears to me to be proper, and possibly some reparation may be due to him for the manner in which he may have been treated. If, however, he has voluntarily enlisted, the British Consul has no legal power or authority to adopt any means to vindicate the allegiance due to Her Majesty, or to prevent him from entering the Russian army. By so doing he will forfeit his right to the protection and privileges of a British subject, and in the event of war between this country and Russia, he may be guilty of high treason by serving in such war, and if captured may legally be dealt with accordingly instead of being treated as a prisoner of war. It may, perhaps, be proper to instruct the Consul to inform and warn Robertson accordingly.

My Lord,

British vessel destroyed by Russians at Sinope. Compensation claimed.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Colonel Freestun, inclosing a Memorial from Ann Smith and James Bowen respecting the destruction of their vessel "The Howard" in the late conflict between the Russian and Turkish squadrons at Sinope; and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship whether, under the circumstances stated by the memorialists, Her Majesty's Government can claim compensation for them from that of Russia.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as the Memorial omits to state many most material facts and circumstances upon which the right of the memorialists to compensation from the Russian Government may in a great measure depend, I can only say that in the absence of such statements the circumstances actually set forth by the memorialists do not appear to me to be sufficient to authorize Her Majesty's Government to claim compensation for them from the Russian Government.

I would venture to suggest that some of the material facts and circumstances to which I have alluded, and as to which nothing is stated in the Memorial, will be:

1. The position and distance in which the "Howard" was actually lying with reference to the Turkish and Russian ships of war and the batteries on shore, when she was destroyed.

2. The precautions (if any) which she took to save herself; such as displaying her colours, making any signal, or otherwise attempting to communicate with or explain her national character to the Russian fleet, or to remove out of the range of fire.

3. Whether her destruction was wholly caused by the Russian attack, or partially by the Turkish defence, and how caused, as by shots directed especially at her, or by stray shots aimed at the hostile forces, or how otherwise.

4. Whether any application (and with what result) was made by her master or consignee on the spot to the Russian Admiral after the termination of the conflict.

5. Whether there were any and what other neutral vessels in the harbour of Sinope during the action, and in what part of it, and what was their fate, or how they escaped or avoided injury.

6. Any circumstances tending to show that the "Howard" was deliberately and purposely destroyed, and that her national character was known to those who destroyed her, or to negative the probability of her having been casually destroyed in the confusion, and in ignorance of her true character, or of her having been mistaken for a Turkish vessel.

I would, however, respectfully suggest to your Lordship whether it may not be expedient simply to require further and full particulars (generally), together with the master's "protest," or original statement from the memorialists, and to abstain for the present from pointing out to them the particular deficiencies in their statement to which I have alluded.

I have, &c.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 11th instant, stating that with reference to his letter of the 2nd instant, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Nash respecting the destruction of the British merchant vessel the "Howard" at Sinope by the Russian fleet, and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, together with those inclosed in his letter above mentioned, and report to your Lordship immediately upon this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and I have the honour to report—

That neither the letter from Messrs. Nash, nor the newspaper extract inclosed therewith and alluded to in my former report, enable me to add anything material to my previous report upon this case, and that I still consider it essential to be furnished with the "protest" or other original statement of the master of the "Howard" in extenso and with the best information which can be supplied upon the various circumstances therein adverted to.

My Lord,

Timber contract. How affected by war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Huddlestone, stating that he has entered into a contract for the purchase of a quantity of Russian wood to be delivered in the ensuing season, and requesting, with reference to the Treaties between this country and Russia, to be informed whether in the event of a war breaking out between the two countries, he will be allowed to ship the goods, or whether the contract will be void by the law of nations; and to request that I would take this application into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to it.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken Mr. Huddlestone's application into consideration, and have the honour to report—

War abrogates Treaties.
Trade with an enemy illegal.

That Mr. Huddlestone may be informed that by the law of nations war abrogates all Treaties between the belligerents, and renders all commercial dealing and traffic with the enemy's dominions illegal on the part of individuals of a belligerent State, unless by the special licence of their own Government, such Government concedes permission to them in particular cases. No contract can render such dealing lawful. It will be for Her Majesty's Government to consider the propriety of granting any such licence to Mr. Huddlestone; if he attempts to carry out his contract without it, the timber in question will, if met with at sea, in the event of war, be exposed to capture and condemnation by Her Majesty's ships, and no licence from Her Majesty's Government could affect the right of the Russian Government in such event, either to interrupt or annul the contract, or to confiscate the timber as enemy's property.

My Lord,

Russian produce being British property on board neutral vessel.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 3rd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Mr. Lousada, Her Majesty's Consul at Riga, inclosing copy of a letter from Messrs. Mitchell and Co., of that city, requesting to be informed what respect would be paid by British cruizers in the event of war to bonâ fide British property, the produce of Russia, if shipped on neutral vessels; and Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would take this subject into consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the answer which it will be proper to return to the inquiry of Messrs. Mitchell and Co.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Lawful prize.

That I am of opinion that property of the description in question, the produce of Russia, and exported therefrom, by, and on account of, a British merchant, domiciled and trading there, although purchased before the war, and exported to England, would not be respected by Her Majesty's cruizers unless in pursuance of a licence, or of some special instructions from Her Majesty to the officers of Her navy. I would beg leave to refer to my report on Mr. Huddlestone's case (of January 13, 1854), and to add that by the law and practice of nations, a belligerent has a right to consider as enemies all persons residing in a hostile country, or who maintain commercial establishments therein, whether such persons be by birth neutrals, allies, enemies, or fellow subjects; the property of such persons, exported from such country, is, therefore, res hostium, and as such, lawful prize of war. Such property will be condemned as prize although its owner may be a native-born subject of the captor's country, and although it may be in transitu to that country, and its being laden on board a neutral ship will not protect the property. It can only be protected from capture by licence; it may be released and restored by the Crown at any time before final condemnation, but not afterwards. "The sloop Cornelis," 1 C. Robinson, p. 196, Potts v. Bell, 8 "Term Reports," p. 548, the "Francis," 8 Cranch, contain the clearest exposition and application of the law of nations on this subject.

Unless, therefore, Her Majesty's Government should consider that this is a proper case for the granting of a license, or should consider that this property, if actually captured ought to be restored, Messrs. Mitchell must be informed that the property in question will not be protected by the Consular certificate, or by any other document, but will be liable to capture and condemnation as prize.

I observe that although Messrs. Mitchell state that it is not their intention to enter into fresh export business, they indicate no intention of giving up their commercial establishment or trade, or of returning with their property to England in the event of war.

I have, &c.

Maritime policy of Denmark.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th instant, stating that, with reference to the note of the Danish Minister, inclosed in Mr. Addington's letter to me of the 4th, and to my report thereupon of the 11th ultimo, relative to the maritime policy which the Court of Denmark, in concert with that of Sweden, has announced its intention to adopt in the event of war, his Lordship was directed to inclose me a despatch which he addressed to Mr. Buchanan, Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, together with his reply upon the same subject; and, with reference to the observations contained in Mr. Buchanan's despatch, Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion, whether there are any, and if any what, points contained in the Danish Minister's note which are contrary to public law.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

That I do not perceive that there is any point contained in the Danish Minister's note which is contrary to public law, but that, if there be any particular point which is supposed to be so, I would venture to request that its real bearing, or practical result, should be indicated, and that my attention should be especially directed thereto.

My Lord,

Protection for Russian vessels now on their voyage to England.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 22nd instant, transmitting a letter from Mr. James Clay, requesting that certain Russian vessels now on their voyage to England, and freighted on British account, may be protected from capture by English or French cruizers in the event of a Declaration of War, and to request that I would take this subject into consideration and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to what can be done in furtherance of Mr. Clay's wishes.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That instructions may, if your Lordship thinks proper, be issued to Her Majesty's ships that, in the event of war breaking out between Great Britain and Russia, they are not to detain the particular ships in question if met with on the particular homeward voyage described, and that in order to enable such instructions to be properly framed, the names correct, and full descriptions of the vessels and of their cargoes, should be furnished, and such further reasonable security required, or precautions taken, against fraud or abuse as may appear proper to your Lordship.

I do not, however, see any reason for protecting the vessels from capture on their arrival here, when their cargoes may be released, nor do I understand Mr. Clay to request protection for them.

British licence will not protect from capture by the French.

It will be, of course, competent for your Lordship to make a representation on the subject to the French Government, but the instructions, or even the formal licence, of one belligerent cannot, by the law of nations, protect trade with the common enemy from interruption or the ships or goods engaged therein from capture and condemnation by another belligerent, although such belligerent be an ally in the same war, and it may be proper to explain this to Mr. Clay.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 27.)

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 27, 1854.

Position of British subjects in Russia in event of war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 26th instant, stating that he was directed to state to me that, as Her Majesty's Minister has already left St. Petersburgh, and as Her Majesty's Consuls, in the event of war breaking out between this country and Russia (which may shortly take place) will necessarily leave that country, your Lordship is desirous of having my opinion as to the position of British subjects when war is declared; and Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would consider this point and report thereupon to you Lordship, if possible, by the early part of Monday, as an opportunity might offer for sending on that day a communication to Her Majesty's Consul at St. Petersburgh on the subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this point into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Dependent on will of Russia, subject to retaliation.

That the position of British subjects in Russia, after war is declared, will, in the absence of all Treaty stipulations, be in great measure dependent on the will and pleasure of the Government of Russia, subject of course to the principle of reciprocity and the right of retaliation. It has indeed in modern times been very usual to insert express stipulations in Treaties containing various special provisions in favour of the subjects of one Power who might be in the dominions of the other in the event of war breaking out, but, in the entire absence of all such stipulations, or of any legal provisions in their favour, I fear that it must be admitted that, by the law of nations, all the goods of the enemy found in the country, whether afloat or on shore, are liable to seizure and confiscation on the breaking out of the war, and the exercise or waiver of such right is a matter for the discretion of the Sovereign Power. The exercise of this right has been constantly modified in practice and has more commonly been limited to goods afloat.

Goods liable to confiscation.

It has been well remarked by high authority "that commercial nations have always considered property in the possession of their neighbours,* and when war breaks out, the question, what shall be done with the enemy's property found in the country is rather of policy than law."—See "Manning's Commentaries," p. 127.—"Kent's Commentaries on American Law," vol. 1, p. 60.—"Brown v. The United States," 8 Cranch, p. 110.

Subject to these remarks, I may add that, practically, reciprocity is the true principle, and in this country it is to be found clearly laid down in Magna Carta, and see "The Santa Cruz," 1, C. Robinson, p. 64.

Detention of non-combatants.

With respect to the persons of non-combatants, it has not been usual to place them under restraint, and the seizure and detention of the English residents in France by Napoleon I in 1803 has met with general disapprobation. It appears to have been, even by the Imperial Government, only justified as being a measure of retaliation for a hostile attack without a formal declaration of war.

Exceptions.

I have however some reason to believe that, on the breaking out of the war with the United States in 1812, the merchant seamen of the United States in the British dominions were detained, and treated as prisoners of war; and I do not conceive that all non-combatants can claim, as a matter of strict right, to be exempt from detention.

Protection for limited period.

It has nevertheless been usual for civilized nations to afford distinct protection for a limited period to "alien enemies" who might be within their dominions on the breaking out of war, in order to give them a reasonable opportunity of settling their affairs and leaving the country, and in so doing they have generally been guided by the prinicple of reciprocity.

I may perhaps be excused for reminding your Lordship—

Declaration of war not necessary to legalize hostilities.

1. That no formal declaration of war is strictly necessary to legalize hostile measures, and the withdrawal of an Ambassador has sometimes been considered to amount to such a declaration.

Effect of a state of war.

2. That inasmuch as war in theory places, not only the two Governments, but every individual of each country in a state of mutual hostility, all commercial intercourse, dealing and correspondence, between the belligerent countries becomes illegal from the breaking out of war unless by the express license of the Crown.

---

3. That after war has broken out, the property of British subjects residing and trading in Russia will be considered as "enemies' property," and they will be guilty of high treason if they give any aid or assistance to the enemy or give him information or intelligence.

The practical consequences of these principles may of course seriously affect the interests of British subjects in Russia, many of whom, from the long peace which has happily prevailed, may be ignorant of them.

It will be for your Lordship to consider whether any and what notice should be issued to Her Majesty's subjects in Russia, and whether and upon what conditions licences should be given to those who may be desirous of entirely ceasing to reside or trade in Russia, and of returning with their property to England, without such licences such property will be liable to capture at sea by Her Majesty's ships, and to condemnation as lawful prize of war.

The necessity for urgent haste in thus preparing this report will, I trust, excuse its very hasty and imperfect character.

My Lord,

British vessels trading to "Baltic ports."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Millers and Arthur, requesting to be informed whether, in the event of a war between this country and Russia, the vessels with cargoes dispatched from this country to Baltic ports would be exposed to being stopped at the Sound; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the answer to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Millers and Arthur may be informed "that Her Majesty's Government is not aware of the existence of any intention of 'stopping at the Sound' in the event of a war between Great Britain and Russia, British goods of the description alluded to, shipped hence in time of peace to Stettin in Prussia." That no further or fuller answer should be given to this application inasmuch as the phrases "Baltic ports" and "stopped at the Sound" are so indefinite as to be suspicious.

The applicants can hardly require to be informed that, whilst trade between British and neutral ports (as Stettin in Prussia) will in case of a war between Great Britain and Russia, be lawful, all trade with Russian "Baltic ports," will be unlawful and may be "stopped," not merely at the Sound, but everywhere on the high seas, and that British goods, if embarked in such a trade with the enemy would of course be condemned, and the applicants are of course aware of the liability of their goods to Russian capture "at the Sound" or elsewhere; at all events, they are not entitled to receive from your Lordship a gratuitous dissertation on the possible effects and consequences of war, so far as it may affect their goods.

Such inquiries, if fully answered, may often compromise Her Majesty's Government, and also may enable the applicants and others to carry out safely enterprizes which may be very adverse to the public interest; and British merchants residing in this country can easily ascertain by legal advice before shipping their goods to any particular port, what risks they incur in the event of war.

Fictitious transfer of Russian vessel to Ionian flag.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying despatch from Mr. Annesley, Her Majesty's Consul at Amsterdam, reporting the circumstances under which he has been called upon to furnish a vessel which has hitherto been sailed under the Russian flag with papers authorizing her to navigate under the Ionian flag, on the ground that she has been sold to an Ionian subject.

That Mr. Annesley has hesitated to furnish the documents required of him in consequence of suspicions which he entertains that the transaction is not a bonâ fide one, but merely a fictitious sale, and he requests to be informed what course he is to pursue under the circumstances set forth in his despatch; and Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that we would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship at our earliest convenience, our opinion as to the course which it would be proper to instruct Mr. Annesley to pursue in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Annesley may be instructed that, although the circumstances are certainly suspicious, they do not furnish such decided proof of fraud as to afford legal grounds for refusing any documents which in the course of his office it would be his duty to deliver, but that, if the nature of the papers to be furnished will admit of his

Doctors' Commons, March 10, 1854.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 2nd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the inclosed copies of communications from parties in this country interested in the Russian trade, and who wish to be informed as to the course to be adopted in case of war with respect to Russian produce; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answers which should be returned to the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Russian produce, the property of British subjects, &c.

That the phrases "Russian produce," the "property of British subjects," "Russian goods," and "if the Baltic be blockaded," are so indefinite that it is difficult to answer these questions clearly and concisely without incurring some risk of misleading the parties interested. Subject to this remark, they may be informed—

Evasion of blockade subjects ships to capture.

1st. That if any of the Baltic ports or coasts should be blockaded, all attempts to violate or evade such blockade will subject all ships and cargoes so offending (to whomsoever they may belong, or of whatsoever produce the cargoes may be composed) to capture and condemnation as prize of war.

2nd. That the importation into the British dominions by British merchants of goods purchased in neutral countries, bonâ fide, and not for the purpose of carrying on an indirect and circuitous trade with the enemy's dominions, will be legal and unmolested as a general rule.

Russian property will be captured;

3rd. That the circumstance of the goods being "Russian," if it is thereby meant that they are Russian property, or really in course of being imported from Russia into England, will expose them to capture and condemnation, even although the ship may have touched at, or the goods have been colourably transhipped or transferred at a neutral port in the course of the voyage, all trade with the enemy being illegal.

but not neutral goods, originally Russian.

If by "Russian goods" it be meant merely that such goods (as hemp and tallow, for instance) were originally produced in Russia and have since been purchased from neutrals at a neutral port, and in the ordinary course of trade with such port by British merchants, the fact that they were originally produced in Russia will be immaterial. The material questions in such cases when brought before Prize Courts relate to the bonâ fide property or interest in the goods, and the course of trade in which they were actually engaged when captured, and not to the place of their original production or manufacture.

All bonâ fide trade between neutral countries and the British dominions will be lawful and unmolested as a general principle, and if captors detain or capture any ships or goods without probable cause of suspicion, they will be restored with costs and damages.

It will be for your Lordship to consider what portion of this report should be communicated to the applicants.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received March 15.)

Doctors' Commons, March 15, 1854.

My Lord,

British cargoes waiting to load in Russian ports on outbreak of war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 14th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. William Price, requesting to know what amount of protection from seizure by English or French cruizers Her Majesty's Government would afford in the event of war to certain specified cargoes now waiting to load in Russian ports in which British merchants are interested; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Price's application, and, further, that I would send in my report on this matter on Thursday morning next.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

License or order necessary.

That unless licences should be granted to the applicant, or a special Order in Council issued, or Act of Parliament passed, or at least orders given to Her Majesty's ships, and also to the ships of war of the Allies of Her Majesty, in respect of the goods in question, they will be liable to capture and condemnation.

All trading with enemy illegal.

No principle of international law is more clear than that war renders all trading with the enemy, and all commercial intercourse with the enemy's dominions, on the part of merchants settled in a belligerent country, illegal, and subjects the property engaged therein to condemnation, in whatever ships or under whatever circumstances it may be carried on, "ex naturâ belli commercia inter hostes cessare non est dubitandum."

There is no difference in such cases between goods going to or coming from the enemy's ports, and, although grievous hardships may be caused in particular cases by the application of this rule to the goods of Her Majesty's subjects, yet the power of the Crown to dispense with it has been considered a sufficient answer to all such objections. (See particularly the "Hoop," Cornelis, 1, C. Robinson, p. 196, and the cases there cited.)

Mr. Price's cargoes not yet British property.

In this particular case, however, I conceived it to be my duty to point out to your Lordship that, as to the "10 cargoes bought at Onega for shipment in 1854 (bills accepted and due in May next for two-thirds of their value)," the date of the purchase is not given, and this particular transaction does not seem entitled to the same favourable consideration as the others, inasmuch as I understand all the other goods to have been already paid for, and to have become British property in 1853, whilst these particular goods appear to be still the subject of contract or dealing, apparently intended to be carried out and completed, notwithstanding the war, which is contrary to law and public policy.

General principle as to trade before war is imminent.

Neither does it appear with respect to these goods that the contract was not made when war was imminent, nor that the contract, if made before war was impending, could not have been rescinded in sufficient time.

In conclusion, I would venture to submit to your Lordship whether some general principle might not be adopted by Her Majesty's Government as governing the numerous cases likely to arise of British property bonâ fide acquired in goods in Russia before war was imminent, and which the owners may be permitted by the Russian Government to transmit to England.

Subject to these remarks, it will be entirely a matter for your Lordship in your discretion to determine whether a license should be granted, and if granted, on what terms and conditions, exempting from capture all or any, and which, of the goods in question. Even such a license will not protect them from capture by Her Majesty's Allies, with whom it may be desirable that a distinct arrangement should be made to meet such cases.

Doctors' Commons, March 15, 1854.

My Lord,

Contemplated modification of Prize Laws.

WITH reference to the numerous cases recently referred to me from the Foreign Office for reports as to cargoes and goods in which either British merchants or alien friends resident here are interested, and which may be exposed to capture in the event of war, I have the honour to state that I have been informed by the First Lord of the Admiralty that Her Majesty's Government have under consideration the expediency of introducing and announcing very shortly some important modifications in the application of the Law of Prize as hitherto enforced in previous wars, especially with respect to enemy's goods laden on board neutral ships, and possibly on other points of great interest and importance to all engaged in commerce.

Warning not to tell merchants that "flag will not cover cargo" if that rule is to be relaxed.

I therefore conceive it to be my duty most respectfully to point out to your Lordship the serious consequences which may result to the commercial interests of individuals if applicants should rely and act upon the information and answers received from your Lordship in accordance with my reports in these cases (which reports are framed upon the old and existing practice in prize cases) and if immediately afterwards a course of action and policy should be determined upon and announced by Her Majesty's Government entirely at variance with such information. If, for instance, a merchant, on being informed "that the flag will not cover the cargo," should countermand his order, or forego or forfeit an advantageous contract, and should immediately afterwards find that it will do so, he will naturally complain. I merely mention this as one instance out of many in illustration of my meaning.

It will be, of course, entirely for your Lordship to consider whether, by delaying the answers in these cases, or appending to them any caution, or by any other means, the consequences to which I have alluded may be obviated.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Duncan, requesting to be informed whether, in the event of a blockade of Russian ports, such blockade would be general, and against all neutral flags; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Duncan's application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken Mr. Duncan's letter into consideration and have the honour to report—

Baring conveying a request from Messrs. Fox of Falmouth, to be furnished with certain information with reference to a commercial transaction in Russian hemp, in which that firm proposes to engage; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration and have the honour to report—

Russian hemp purchased at a neutral port.

Russian origin does not expose it to capture.

That the hemp in question, if purchased bonâ fide and not in the course of a trade with the enemy, but in the ordinary course of trade, from a neutral resident in a neutral port, and thence shipped to England on British account, in a British or neutral ship, will not be exposed to condemnation as prize of war, merely because it was originally grown or manufactured in the Russian dominions. It will, of course, be necessary that the proper documents should be on board, and that there should be no suspicious circumstances about the ship or any portion of her cargo. The existence of such circumstances, or the absence of such documents, might justify her detention or capture, even although not justifying the ultimate condemnation of the hemp as prize.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 11th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Stedingk, requesting information as to the manner in which certain descriptions of goods specified by him would be dealt with in case of war, and to request that I would take the same into my consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the party.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That an answer may be returned to Mr. Stedingk to the effect:—

Russian vessels with Russian or British cargoes for England liable to capture.

1. That Russian vessels carrying either Russian or British property from Russia to England will be liable, in case of war, to be captured on their voyage or after their arrival, although they may have passed Constantinople before any declaration of war. The cargoes alluded to will, in the event of war, be liable to be condemned as prize in the absence of any license from the Crown, or any Order in Council, or other sufficient authority.

The neutral vessels would probably be restored.

"Danubian produce."

2. That the phrase "Danubian produce," especially with reference to the recent and present political condition of the countries bordering on the Danube, is so indefinite as to render it impossible to give a definite or satisfactory answer to this question.

As to vague inquiries by foreigners.

I trust I may be excused for pointing out that in this case the applicant, who appears to be a foreigner and engaged in the Russian trade, omits (as I conceive designedly) to state either the place, the date, the amount, or any other particulars of the purchase or shipment of any of his goods, excepting that he "has several cargoes of grain," and the phrase "Danubian produce" may (as he must well know) apply indiscriminately either to Austrian or Turkish produce, or to the produce of one or more provinces of Turkey, shipped either before or since they were occupied by Russia.

I would respectfully suggest to your Lordship the possible expediency of not answering, or at least of not encouraging, such applications made by foreigners, and unaccompanied by any reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration and have the honour to report—

That the question of overland trade between neutral and hostile countries in the event of war is so important, especially having regard to the increased facilities of communication now afforded by railways, and to the announcement of the city article of the "Times" newspaper of the 17th instant, that a line of steamers has been advertized to run from Hull to Pillau, taking goods for Memel, "with the view of carrying on trade between England and Russia," that I must request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, and also such further information or instructions on the point as it may be considered expedient to communicate on this subject.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 14th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. William Thompson, requesting information as to the restrictions which would be placed, in the event of war, on the movements of British vessels loading in Russian ports for the United Kingdom or the Continent, and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Thompson.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Thompson may be informed generally that the goods in question, shipped from Russia by Russian firms to English houses on consignment, will be liable to capture and condemnation in the event of war. I remark that the applicant does not ask for a license or any indulgence, but simply whether he incurs any risk by trading with the enemy after a declaration of war, which he evidently proposes to do. He gives no particulars or dates of the purchases or shipments, which were therefore, I presume, made with full knowledge of the impending war, and which there probably was ample time to countermand.

This may possibly be the result of honest ignorance, as he appears to be an imperfectly-educated man, but it has a singular and suspicious appearance.

Doctors' Commons, March 20, 1854.

My Lord,

Position of Russians in England in event of war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Waguelin, respecting the position of Russian subjects in this country in the event of war; and to request that I would take the letter into consideration and report to your Lordship such observations as may occur to me thereupon, by Monday next, on which day your Lordship is to receive the Deputation referred to in the inclosed letter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Persons and property may be seized.

That although I should, if time permitted, be most desirous of the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General on this matter, I proceed to remark, that I humbly conceive that Her Majesty has, by virtue of her Royal Prerogative and in accordance with the law of nations, the absolute and unqualified right of seizing or detaining the persons as well as the property of all enemies who may, under whatever circumstances, be within her dominions on the breaking out of war.

Relaxations of rule.

The numerous instances of relaxations in the application of the principle, whether by special Convention, by the issue of letters of safe-conduct, by the practice of expressly taking such persons under Royal protection on the breaking out of war, and other similar instances, are exceptions which prove "the rule" of the existence of which I conceive that there can be no reasonable doubt.

Authorities.

It is distinctly stated in a book of high authority on these subjects (Chitty's "Prerogative of the Crown," p. 48), "As conductor of the war, the King is also entitled to adopt measures to prevent the egress or ingress of his enemies out of or into His Majesty's dominions; thus His Majesty may promulgate blockades; may, during war or threatened hostilities, and on occasions of emergency, lay an embargo on all shipping, and thereby prevent any one from leaving the Kingdom," and the author refers to several decided cases in support of his position. So in the United States, in the case of Brown v. the United States (8 Cranch, p. 110), before the Supreme Court of the United States, the broad principle was assumed "that war gave to the Sovereign the full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found; and that the mitigation of this rigid rule, which the wise and humane policy of modern times had introduced into practice, might more or less affect the exercise of the right, but not impair the right itself" (Kent's "Commentaries," vol. i, p. 59).

This is also the principle laid down by the best authorities upon the law of nations "At de his qui bello exorto deprehensi erant dici idem non poterat; nam in illis nullum injuriæ consilium fingi poterat. Tamen ad minuendas hostium vires retineri eos manente bello non iniquum videbatur" (Grotius, book iii, cap. 9, sec. 4); and in a subsequent passage in the same book, cap. 21, sec. 29, he says of such a person, "quem captivum manere ad pacem usque supra notavimus."

So Bynkershoek, "Quæst. Jur. Pub.," cap. 3: "Captura autem quamvis apud Romanos etiam exercita sit adversus eos qui tempore belli exoriuntis in alterius imperio inveniebantur, hodie, quamvis exerceri possit, raro tamen exercetur."

"Le genre le plus usité de représailles c'est la saisie de personnes ou de biens rencontrés soit dans notre territoire, soit en pleine mer" (Martens, Précis, l. iii, c. 2, s. 259).

"The persons and property of enemies found in a belligerent state when war breaks out may be rightfully seized by the Government; the individuals as prisoners of war" (Manning's Commentaries, p. 125).

With respect to the ancient Statute of Staples, 27 Edw. III, cap. 17, alluded to by Mr. Weguelin, I may remark that it is (like Magna Charta) confined to merchants, and provides for their absolute expulsion.

General practice.

The general practice has been far more mild than that indicated by these old statutes, for although some exceptions have occurred, such as the seizure and detention of the English by Napoleon I in 1803, and the detention of the United States' merchant seamen as prisoners of war by England in 1812, yet it has certainly been usual in modern wars to waive or suspend the exercise of this right, "alien enemies," remaining in England and conducting themselves peaceably, have even been expressly taken under the protection of the Crown in many instances, and thereby placed in the same legal position as alien friends. See instances in Foster's "Crown Law," p. 185.

High treason.

Provision was made in the United States of North America, by Act of Congress of July 6, 1798, cap. 73, for the same purpose, and the common modern practice of nations has, I believe, been to permit alien enemies to remain unmolested in war. It seems that such persons, by withdrawing from this country and serving their own in war, or by conveying information to the enemy, or similar acts, will be guilty of high treason (Foster's "Crown Law," p. 185), of which, perhaps, it would be fair to give them notice.

Reciprocity.

I cannot, therefore, upon the whole, see any objection to your Lordship's informing Mr. Weguelin that Russians who remain here and abstain from any overt acts whatsoever in favour of the enemy will be treated, at least, as well as the English resident in Russia; at the same time he may be informed that the right to make them prisoners of war, or otherwise to treat them as Her Majesty's subjects may be treated in Russia, cannot be doubted or disputed.

It will be for Her Majesty's Government ultimately to determine whether, by proclamation or otherwise, any specific declaration of Her Majesty's intentions towards such persons should be publicly made, and if so, in what terms, whether unreservedly or subject to any and what reservation.

If this is to be done, no time should be lost in sending me instructions through the Queen's Proctor on the point, as by the directions of the First Lord of the Admiralty I am engaged in preparing the legal documents connected with the impending declaration of war.

Doctors' Commons, March 20, 1854.

My Lord,

Fate of goods, the produce of Russia.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 11th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Messrs. Draper, Petroni, and Co., containing various questions respecting the fate of goods, the produce of Russia, in the event of war, and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this is another of those cases in which I conceive the real and ultimate object of the applicants is to ascertain how far they can safely trade with the enemy, and I observe that these cases are all hypothetical, that they do not state any facts, and that it is very difficult to answer such questions framed in language which is purposely vague and indefinite, with legal accuracy.

The publication of the answers given below would, in my humble opinion, be a matter of very doubtful expediency at the present conjuncture. It is, however, a matter exclusively for your Lordship's decision.

Practice of English Prize Courts.

I proceed to answer the various questions as well as I can understand them, according to the law and practice hitherto observed by English Prize Tribunals in war.

(1). It is necessary to explain that "capture" is by no means identical with "condemnation." Suspicion will justify capture, but innocence, when proved, will avoid condemnation and obtain restoration.

Trade with enemy.

(2). That trade between belligerent States is illegal.

Neutral trade.

(3.) That neutrals may trade with either of the belligerents, or with each other.

1. Goods the produce of Russia shipped by any flag, Russian excepted, for account of British subjects resident in Russia.

2. Goods the produce of Russia shipped by Russian flag, for account of British subjects non-resident in Russia.

3. Goods the produce of Russia shipped by any flag (not Russian) for account of foreigners being allies or neutrals, and residing out of Russia.

4. Goods the produce of Russia shipped by a Russian flag for account of foreigners being allies or neutrals, and residing out of Russia.

5. Goods the produce of Russia shipped from a port, not Russian, by British, neutral, or ally's flag, and being the property of a British subject.

6. Goods the produce of Russia shipped from a port, not Russian, by British allies, or neutral flag, and being the property of allies or neutrals.

7. Does the British flag cover the cargo, provided the same is not the property of a Russian subject?

8. Under what circumstances will the "license or special instruction" referred to in your Lordship's afore-mentioned despatch be granted?

Goods for neutrals in Russian ships.

1 and 2. That goods the produce of Russia shipped from Russian ports by any flag for account of, and going to, British subjects domiciled in neutral countries, will not be liable to condemnation, all persons having a neutral domicile being treated as neutrals in the English Prize Courts, but if such British subjects should be resident or carrying on their trade in the dominions of Her Majesty, or of her allies in the war, such goods will be liable to condemnation.

The Russian flag will in all cases expose both ship and goods to capture. If such British subjects are domiciled or trading in the dominions of Her Majesty or any of her allies, their goods taken trading with the enemy will be condemned; if domiciled in a neutral country they will be considered as neutrals, and may lawfully trade with the enemy, although they may be British subjects.

All ships under the Russian flag will be exposed to condemnation as prize.

Domicile of owner fixes nationality of goods.

3 and 4. Such goods, if the property of neutrals or persons domiciled in neutral countries, will be released; but if the property of our allies will be condemned for trading with the enemy, neither the place of birth nor the nationality of the owner are decisive in such cases; the question is usually the domicile of the owner and the course or nature of his trade.

The fact of the ship being under the Russian flag will not necessarily condemn the goods of neutrals laden on board, but will justify their detention and capture. They will only be released on legal proof of neutrality.

Flag does not cover cargo.

5 and 6. If such goods are not engaged directly in a trade with the enemy, but have been purchased bonâ fide in a British, neutral, or ally's port, and are going bonâ fide to another port of the same description, and there are no circumstances of fraud or suspicion connected therewith, they will not incur any risk.

7. The British flag will not cover the cargo in any case. The question will not turn upon the flag, but upon the nature and ownership of, or interest in the property, and the real purpose of the voyage.

8. This is a matter entirely for the consideration and decision of Her Majesty's Government.

Hudson's Bay Company. Proposed neutrality with Russian American Company.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the Hudson's Bay Company respecting a proposal made by the Russian American Company, that in case of war between the Governments of England and Russia, a state of reciprocal neutrality should exist with reference to the two Companies; and to request that we would take this subject into our consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the Hudson's Bay Company.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken into consideration the letter from the Hudson's Bay Company, and have the honour to report—

No objection.

That we are of opinion that under the peculiar circumstances of the case, your Lordship will be justified in consenting to the proposed arrangement being entered into between the two Companies, and, in causing the necessary instructions to be conveyed to Her Majesty's naval officers, and others, not to commit hostilities on land within the Russian dominions on the coast of America.

Conditions.

We beg to suggest, however, that the Hudson's Bay Company should be informed that the proposed neutrality will, as far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned, be territorial only, and confined to the land, and that its operation will not extend to the high seas, but that all Russian vessels and goods thereon, whether the property of the Company, the Government, or of individuals, and, whether going to, or from the possessions of the Russian American Company, will be liable to capture by Her Majesty's ships, and that the coasts and ports of those possessions will be liable to naval blockade.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 14th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Treasury, inclosing a letter from Messrs. Catlinge and Co., requesting exemption of certain cargoes of Russian produce from capture in the event of war; and to request that I would take these papers into my consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned to Messrs. Catlinge's application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Goods shipped from Russia before declaration of war.

That the answer to be returned to Messrs. Catlinge must, in common with those to be returned in many similar cases, depend upon the determination to which Her Majesty's Government may come with respect to what is to be done with Russian produce purchased and shipped to England by British merchants before the war. In strict practice, and in the absence of those relaxations of the laws of war which have been usually made in former wars in favour of British subjects by Order in Council, license, or otherwise, such produce will (as I have frequently explained) be liable to capture and condemnation as prize.

Subject to this remark, the cases of the "Nyord" and the "Habbett" appear to me to be very deserving of indulgence, if your Lordship is satisfied of the truth of the statements that the "Nyord" sailed from Odessa about the 18th November, and that her cargo was paid for in cash on 16th December, and that the "Habbett" sailed from Odessa about the 7th December, and that her cargo was paid in cash on the 3rd January.

The cargo of the "Free Trade" is not so favourably circumstanced as the other goods, inasmuch as the ship only sailed from Odessa on the 2nd February, and her cargo was paid for in cash on the 17th February, at a period when war was apprehended as being imminent, and the order might probably have been countermanded if due diligence had been used.

My Lord,

Neutral flag on high seas, and neutral property in Russia.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Colquhoun, Agent and Consul-General of the Hanse Towns, requesting to know the intentions of the British and French Governments with respect to the flag of neutral States on the high seas, and the property within the territories of Russia belonging to the subjects of neutral States; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this is a question of general political expediency, very proper for the decision of the Government of Her Majesty, in conjunction with her Allies in the impending war. The argument of Mr. Colquhoun ab inconvenienti applies to every blockade without exception. There is in every blockaded port—at all events, at the commencement of hostilities—some property originally the produce of the soil, or the manufacture of the country, which has been purchased and paid for by neutrals, and which they must be always anxious to export. There does not appear to me to be anything very peculiar in the case of Hanseatic purchases in Russia; probably many merchants of various nations will be precisely in the same situation in the event of the Russian ports being blockaded. It would be very difficult, if not impossible to make exceptions in favour of any one or more nations; all would naturally insist upon being treated alike, and it would, I fear, be found practically impossible to prevent any particular privileges from being abused, and if once Russian property is exported it will certainly be paid for or the value returned in some shape, and thus the very object of blockade will be frustrated.

Blockades admit of no exceptions.

It is obvious, however, that this question is one, not of international law, but of policy and expediency, and as I am wholly ignorant of the intentions or ideas entertained on this subject either by the Government of Her Majesty or that of France, I feel incompetent to offer any useful advice to your Lordship.

Blockade rights must be insisted on.

I may, however, perhaps be permitted to suggest that if (as I have reason to believe) Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to relax in some degree the exercise of belligerent rights as respects neutrals in ordinary cases, this would appear to render it more than ever necessary to insist upon the vigorous exercise of such rights in the event of blockade, otherwise the enemy's trade will be transferred to and covered by neutral flags—the flags of England, France, and Russia being alone excluded, and Russian commerce will be entirely uninjured by the naval forces of Her Majesty and her ally, so that a "war for arms" will co-exist with a "peace for commerce," contrary to what has hitherto been supposed to be a fundamental principle of public and national policy.

My Lord,

Dates of departure of Ambassadors, &c.

AS it is now frequently necessary for me in Reports to your Lordship on the various and difficult questions which are connected with the impending war to take into consideration the exact date from which war is to be considered as impending or imminent, between this country and Russia, I request to be furnished with such information on this point as it may be in your Lordship's power to afford me, and particularly as to the date of the Russian Ambassador's notification of his withdrawal, and of his actual departure from this country, also the date and particulars of any public or official statement by Her Majesty's Government, in Parliament or otherwise, of the intended withdrawal of Her Majesty's Minister from Russia, the date when orders to withdraw were sent to him, and the date of his actual departure. It might also be desirable that I should be informed of the date when all direct and ordinary diplomatic intercourse is to be considered as having ceased between the two nations, and when and in what shape your Lordship conceives that the earliest public and official announcement was made, or notice given of war being imminent, which can be fairly considered as binding or operative upon merchants and the public in general in Great Britain.

My Lord,

Russian sailors under neutral flag sent to reinforce Russian squadrons.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me an extract of a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon, in reply to the inclosed instruction addressed to him by your Lordship respecting the alleged intention of the Russian Government to send under a neutral flag from Portugal some Russian sailors to reinforce the Russian squadron in the Japanese seas; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion thereon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, the opinion stated by M. de Lisle in Sir R. Pakenham's letter, March 10, 1854, to have been come to on this subject by the Commanders of the "Petrel" and the "Newton," appears to me to be correct; and I am of opinion that the ships of Her Majesty, or of her allies, would be justified in capturing on the high seas all vessels under whatever flag carrying Russian sailors intended to reinforce Russian cruizers. The ostensible port of destination of such vessels is not stated; their real destination can, I presume, be proved to be the Russian squadron in the Japanese seas, and if so, it will render such vessels, even if neutral property, liable to condemnation.

It will be for your Lordship to consider whether it may not be proper to invite the attention of the Dutch and Portuguese Governments, and to call upon them to prevent the carrying out of this enterprize, and whether some arrangement may not be come to between the Governments of Her Majesty and of her ally, as to the actual capture and immediate disposal of the ships in question; as, for instance, whether they shall be actually captured by a French or English vessel, and whether they shall be sent for adjudication to a British or to a French port.

It may also be desirable to invite the attention of Her Majesty's Diplomatic and Consular servants in Holland to this matter, with a view to obtain the best information as to the actual purchase and ostensible destination of the vessels in question.

My Lord,

Dutch ships sent to Riga to fetch away British property.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Robert Mackay Smith requesting to be informed whether Dutch ships, to be sent out for the purpose, would be permitted to bring away some property belonging to him at present at Riga.

Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would take this paper into my consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Smith.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Must get licence.

That, inasmuch as the goods in question appear to be exclusively British property, and to have been purchased and paid for long before war was imminent, I humbly conceive that your Lordship may inform Mr. Smith that, on being satisfied of the truth and bona fides of his statement, Her Majesty's Government will offer no impediment to the importation of these particular "two cargoes of goods," for which, however, proper licenses must be obtained.

I observe, however, that Mr. Smith puts a very abstract question; he does not state that the goods are his own property, nor does he describe them in any manner, and that it does not appear in what capacity, or on whose behalf, he applies to your Lordship in this matter. Under these circumstances, your Lordship may, perhaps, think proper to require some further information upon these points before answering Mr. Smith.

My Lord,

Neutral property from Odessa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 15th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me letter from Messrs. Ralli and Sons, requesting information as to whether neutral vessels, with neutral property on board, now loading at Odessa, or on their way from Odessa to England, would, in case of war, be liable to capture by British cruizers; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to this application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, subject to any determination at which Her Majesty's Government may arrive on these or similar points, Messrs. Ralli may be informed—

Definition of enemies and enemies' property.

1. That in the event of war, all persons whatsoever their origin who are domiciled in, or trading from, the dominions of the enemy are considered as enemies. Russian produce on its way from Odessa to England can, therefore, hardly be, as they describe it, "neutral property:" it is in all probability either "enemy's property," or "British property trading with the enemy," and if so, its being laden on board neutral vessels will not protect it from capture and condemnation.

Definition of neutral property.

2. That neutral property proceeding from an enemy's port to a neutral port will not be condemned; but property the produce of Russia belonging to merchants domiciled or keeping up commercial establishments in Russia, will be considered as enemy's property, and not as neutral property.

I observe that Messrs. Ralli put their questions in an abstract form, and do not state that they are interested in any particular shipping or goods, and it will be for your Lordship to decide upon the expediency of answering these abstract questions, the framers of which seem to me to contemplate a course of trading with the enemy.

Messrs. Ralli, from their position and extensive dealings, cannot be ignorant of the law on this subject, and could easily ascertain what will be the real position of their property in war, without asking your Lordship such very general questions.

Russian vessel "Vesta." Exemption from capture.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 18th instant, stating that with reference to my report of the 8th,* respecting the application of Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. for protection to the Russian vessel "Vesta," freighted on British account, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to me a further letter from the Treasury inclosing copies of further communications from Messrs. Arbuthnot on this matter, and requesting to be informed as to the nature of the security which Messrs. Arbuthnot should be required to furnish to the Board of Admiralty before any steps can be taken to obtain for them the indulgence they seek; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and to report to your Lordship my opinion on the point above referred to, together with any further observations I may have to offer.

The former papers are herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Orders may be given.

Ship may be proceeded against on arrival in port, and cargo released.

That not having suggested that Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. should be required to give any security to the Lords of the Admiralty or otherwise in the matter of the "Vesta," I am unable to advise upon the nature of that security. If the statement of Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. is correct, the ship may possibly even arrive, discharge her cargo, and depart before war is declared, in which case the interference of Her Majesty's Government will not be necessary. The only contingency which occurs to me is that her master and crew may hear of the impending war and may change her destination for a neutral port; but I do not see how this can be prevented (war not being declared), unless, indeed, your Lordship should think proper to call on Messrs. Arbuthnot to give bond to the full amount of the value of the ship and cargo that this shall not be done; otherwise, if your Lordship is satisfied of the truth of Messrs. Arbuthnot's case, which is corroborated by their statement of the particulars, and their offer to give security, it will only be necessary that they should be informed that orders will be given not to capture the "Vesta" in the event of war, provided that when met with she is clearly bound and going direct to a British port, and that such orders should be given accordingly. When in port the cargo may be released and the ship alone proceeded against; the master and crew, if Russians, will be, in my opinion, entitled to very favourable consideration.

My Lord,

Tallow from Odessa in a Hanoverian vessel.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Mollel respecting a cargo of tallow consigned to him from Odessa, and shipped on board a Hanoverian vessel.

Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would take this paper into my consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be addressed to Mr. Mollel.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot exempt from capture.

That I am of opinion that the circumstances stated by Mr. Mollel are insufficient to enable your Lordship to comply with his request. He does not state when, or under what circumstances, the order was given for, or the purchase made of, this tallow, nor why it was not countermanded on war becoming imminent. He does not state whether the Hanoverian ship "Charon" has sailed from Odessa, or even when she was expected to sail, although he must be informed of these matters. Mr. Menger, the shipper, is, I presume, to be considered as commercially domiciled at Odessa, and if so, his being the subject or Consul of a neutral Power will not affect the question; but it is very singular (if true) that he should "have no idea that the cargo can in any eventuality be exposed to the risk of capture," inasmuch as, being a Consul and a merchant, he must, I should suppose, have some idea that trading with the enemy is illegal on the part of all merchants settled in the country of either belligerent, and that on a declaration of war he, and all others in the same situation continuing to reside and trade in Russia, will be legally enemies to England. I would, for these reasons, respectfully submit to your Lordship that Mr. Mollel should be informed that no such directions as he requests can be issued in favour of the "Charon" and her cargo.

Shipper ought to know better.

Residents in Russia are enemies.

My Lord,

Bond required by Customs for due delivery of warlike stores at destination.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 15th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Treasury, stating that the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have been ordered to require shippers of warlike stores to give bond for their due delivery at the port of destination, and requesting that notice may be given to Her Majesty's Consuls that proof of discharge of such stores under their hand and seal will be required by the Customs; and Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would report to your Lardship my opinion whether the course pursued in this matter fully meets the requirements of Her Majesty's Proclamation.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That, not having any information as to the precise objects which the Proclamation was intended practically to accompiish, or the nature of the designs against which it was in reality directed, I am scarcely in a position to say whether the course pursued in this matter fully meets its requirements; but, according to my view of these requirements, the course pursued is far from meeting them. I do not, I confess, precisely understand what the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury mean by "the improper export of those articles," which "they are desirous of preventing by every means in their power." Perhaps it is not meant to permit their exportation in all cases, even where the bonds in the prescribed form are given; but nothing is stated to this effect, and if all persons giving bond are to be allowed to export the prohibited articles to all neutral or friendly ports, there can be little doubt of such articles soon reaching either the enemy or the rebellious subjects of allies, as the case may be. Gunpowder, for instance, exported under bond, say to Memel, to Smyrna, or Valona, would probably easily reach the very persons whom it would be most desirable to prevent its reaching, and this without any breach of the conditions of the bond.

Insufficient.

Proper conditions for export of arms.

The bond may be a very proper precaution, but it does not appear to me to be sufficient. I would humbly submit that, in order to meet the requirements of the Proclamation, every effort must be used entirely to prevent the export of such articles on any terms to places where they may easily reach those whom it is meant to prevent their reaching; for instance, that they should not be shipped on any terms to any port in Europe (say), north of Dunkirk or east of Genoa, or to any port in Asia, unless on the application of the Turkish Government; or if this should be thought too rigorous a measure, I do not think it would be unreasonable to require an application from the Government of which the consignee may be a subject in such case, and an assurance from that Government that it would take care that the articles did not leave the country.

Precautions against improper export.

Effect of allowing flag to cover cargo.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to point out to your Lordship that if Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to allow the flag to cover the cargo, the question of enforcing this Proclamation will be one of great practical importance, and that if these articles are furnished on any terms by England to neutral countries between which and Russia, or the revolted subjects of the Porte, direct commercial intercourse and communications exist, there can be no doubt but that they will, either directly or indirectly, reach those who may be ready to pay for them, and that British merchants will, as on former occasions, readily supply arms, ammunition, and stores, to be used even against their own country.

British merchants will supply arms against their country.

This subject, is, however, more proper for the consideration of the executive authorities, especially in the naval and military departments of Her Majesty's Government, than for my advice; but I have deemed it my duty respectfully to submit to your Lordship the view which I have taken of it, which is shortly to the effect that these bonds alone will not prove, by any means, a sufficient practical check or security against improper exportations of warlike stores.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 23, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 21st instant, stating that he was directed to request that I would acquaint your Lordship whether Russian produce brought over the frontier to Prussian ports and shipped from thence by British or neutral vessels, will be subject to seizure by Her Majesty's cruizers and subsequent confiscation in the Court of Admiralty.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Goods brought by land from Russia to Prussia, and shipped thence by British or neutral vessels,

That, assuming that the question meant to be proposed is whether, in the event of war between this country and Russia, Russian produce brought over the frontier by land to Prussian ports, and shipped from thence by British or neutral vessels, will be subject to seizure by Her Majesty's cruizers, and to subsequent confiscation in the High Court of Admiralty.

Depends on ownership and destination whether liable to capture.

I have the honour to report that the question will turn upon the true ownership of, or the interest or risk in, and the destination of the property which may be seized or captured, and that neither the place of its origin nor the manner of its conveyance to the port from whence it was shipped will be decisive or even, in most cases, of any real importance.

If shipped at neutral risk, or after it has become bonâ fide neutral property, it will not be liable to condemnation, whatever may be its destination; if it should still remain enemy's property, notwithstanding it is shipped from a neutral port and in a neutral ship, it will be condemned, whatever may be its destination; if it be British property, or shipped at British risk, or on British account, it will be condemned if it is proved to be really engaged in a trade with the enemy, but not otherwise. The place of its origin will be immaterial, and if there has been a bonâ fide and complete transfer of the ownership to a neutral (as by purchase in the neutral market), the goods will not be liable to condemnation, notwithstanding they may have come to that neutral market from the enemy's country, either overland or by sea.

I may, however, observe that circumstances of reasonable suspicion will justify capture, although release (and not condemnation) may follow, and ships with cargoes of Russian produce may not improbably be considered, under certain circumstances, as liable to capture, even though not liable to condemnation; but captors seize at their own risk, and are liable to costs and damages, if they seize without probable cause.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 16th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Kirkland, requesting that means may be taken for the protection of property belonging to them, coming to this country from the Havannah on board the Russian ship "Argo," and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Kirkland and as to the course which should be adopted in the event of their application being complied with.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken into consideration Messrs. Kirklands' letter, and have the honour to report—

Orders not to capture.

Release cargo.

Proceed against vessel.

That, provided your Lordship is satisfied of the entire truth and accuracy of Messrs. Kirklands' statement, the case of the cargo of the Russian ship "Argo" appears to be entitled to the favourable consideration of the Government. It may, therefore, be proper to cause the necessary instructions to be issued not to capture her if she be met with at sea, when clearly bound and going to a British port. Should she arrive after war has been declared, the cargo may be released and the ship proceeded against as prize.

My Lord,

Russian produce shipped on British account from Russian ports in British or neutral vessels.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 20th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Eastley as to the liability of Russian produce shipped on British account in Russian ports on board British or neutral vessels to be confiscated on war being declared with Russia; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the reply.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1. That the purchase which Messrs. Edwards and Eastly have "just made" must have been made after the war was known to be imminent, and when the property was not expected to arrive until after a declaration of war.

2. That they do not state whose property the linseed would have been on its arrival had they not purchased it. They do not state whose it was when shipped, or on what terms or on whose order or account it was actually shipped, or whether it had changed hands, and under what circumstances, before they purchased it.

3. That the only date of its shipment is stated to be "February," so that it may have been shipped when war was known at Odessa to be impending, and when there was time to countermand it.

Capture, unless days of grace are allowed.

Under these circumstances, the case does not appear to me to be of a very favourable character; and, unless some general measures should be taken which would protect all property of this character, or all destined for England which had left Russia before a certain date (as has been frequently done in former wars), I see no such peculiar circumstances in favour of the applicants as should induce Her Majesty's Government to interfere, and their case may fairly and properly be disposed of in the Admiralty Court should the linseed be captured or seized.

It will be for your Lordship to consider whether it will be proper to confine the answer to be returned to the applicants to the preceding paragraph.

My Lord,

Instructions to Admiralty.

WITH reference to your Lordship's draft instructions to the Admiralty, dated the 4th instant (inclosed), relating to vessels supposed to be engaged in conveying arms from Belgium to the revolted subjects of the Sultan, upon which I had yesterday the honour of a conference with your Lordship, I have now the honour to report—

Seizure of arms destined for insurgents in Turkey.

That if the instruction is to be understood as directing the commanders of Her Majesty's ships of war to seize and detain ships with arms on board which may appear to be destined for any ports from whence it is probable that such arms would be conveyed to the revolted subjects of the Sultan, I am of opinion that such conduct on the part of Her Majesty's naval officers would be at variance with the law of nations.

1. It must be borne in mind, with the exception of the hostilities between Turkey and Russia, complete and universal peace still exists throughout Europe.

How far lawful.

2. That the insurgents were not by the last advices in possession of any seaport, nor was any port or any portion of the Turkish coast blockaded, nor had any notice whatsoever been given forbidding the importation of arms into any Turkish port. The Turkish Government, therefore, does not appear hitherto to have taken the ordinary measures for preventing the insurgents from being either directly or indirectly supplied with arms by sea, and cannot be considered, therefore, as apprehending any serious danger from the importation of arms into its ports. Belgium has not forbidden the exportation of arms, and Her Majesty's Government is, I apprehend, to be considered as acting in this matter, not in pursuance of any Treaty either with Turkey or Belgium or any other Power, but solely by her own authority.

Under these circumstances, I cannot consider that the capture or detention on the high seas of vessels bound on a lawful voyage, and laden with lawful merchandize, would be justifiable on the part of Her Majesty's ships; if loss of life or even property resulted, the consequences might be very serious; and, above all, even if no such consequences ensued, it appears to me that Great Britain would be furnishing a bad precedent which might hereafter be followed by other nations, and even used against British interests to their serious detriment.

Lord Stowell.

No nation has a stronger interest than Great Britain in maintaining the rights of unrestricted commerce in peace and of neutrality in war, and in preventing (instead of sanctioning) any arbitrary interference with the rights or deviations from the law of nations on these subjects. "Two principles of public law (said Lord Stowell, Le Louis, 2 Dodson, 243) are generally recognized as fundamental. One is the perfect equality and entire independence of all distinct States. Relative magnitude creates no distinction of right; relative imbecility, whether permanent or casual, gives no additional right to the more powerful neighbour; and any advantages seized upon that ground is mere usurpation. This is the great foundation of public law, which it mainly concerns the peace of mankind, both in their politic and private capacities, to preserve inviolate. The second is, that all nations being equal, all have an equal right to the uninterrupted use of the unappropriated parts of the ocean for their navigation. In places where no local authority exists, where the subjects of all States meet upon a footing of entire equality and independence, no one State, or any of its subjects, has a right to assume or exercise authority over the subjects of another. I can find no authority that gives the right of interruption to the navigation of States in amity upon the high seas, excepting that which the rights of war give to both belligerents against neutrals. . . . .

Right of search.

"At present, under the law as now generally understood and practised, no nation can exercise a right of visitation and search upon the common and unappropriated parts of the sea, save only on the belligerent claim. If it be asked why the right of search does not exist in time of peace as well as in war; the answer is prompt; that it has not the same foundation on which alone it is tolerated in war—the necessities of self-defence. They introduce it in war; and practice has established it. No such necessities have introduced it in time of peace, and no such practice has established it."

1853-56

Lawful commerce cannot be interrupted.

"No nation (says Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, vol. I, p. 33) has a right in time of peace to interfere with or interrupt any commerce which is lawful by the law of nations and carried on between other independent States, or between different members of the same State."

In Madrazo v. Willes (3 Barnewall and Alderson, 353), the Court of Queen's Bench unanimously decided that it was illegal for a British officer to seize a foreign slaver unless in accordance with a Treaty with the nation to which she belonged. I need not multiply quotations on the point.

Alternative course.

I would, however, venture to submit that the object in view may possibly be attained without incurring any risk of an infraction of the law of nations by forwarding to the Governments of the seaports to which these particular vessels may be destined, full information, and requesting them to prevent the arms from being sent from such ports to the revolted districts; by inducing the Turkish Government to take stringent measures for the same purpose (such as blockade prohibition of the importation of arms), and by instructing Her Majesty's naval officers closely to watch, and, if necessary, to follow the ships in question, and to communicate thereupon with the local authorities.

Seizures within three-mile limit, &c.

Her Majesty's naval officers will, however, probably be justified in assisting the Turkish or any other local authorities in seizing arms actually found either on shore or waterborne within the ordinary territorial limits (three miles), provided such importation be forbidden and the seizure be justified by the local law, and be made under the orders and in the presence of some of the local authorities.

Assistance of British Naval officers.

They must, however, in so doing act with caution, and only interfere when the local authorities are unable to act without them, and actually request their assistance. They will, of course, be justified in giving every information and indirect assistance to the local authorities (e.g., by taking on board and conveying a local officer to take possession of the vessel laden with arms, if she be within the local jurisdiction), but they must altogether abstain from capturing or detaining such vessels on the high seas; and even when within a foreign jurisdiction, they must not directly, or by their own authority, interfere with such vessels, but only aid and assist the local authorities when actually required by them so to do.

The urgent haste which is required, and the absence of all specific information must plead my apology for any errors or deficiences in this report.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 21st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. exposed to capture unless exempted.

That I am inclined to consider this case as entitled to favourable consideration, although the date of the purchase, "in winter," is somewhat vague with reference to a knowledge of impending war, and nothing is said as to the payment, or impossibility of countermand. Such cargoes, even though conveyed in neutral ships sailing after war is declared, will be exposed to the risk of capture and condemnation, unless measures are taken to exempt them.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 27, 1854.

British vessel laden with Russian produce detained at Cronstadt by ice.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 20th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Cates and Son, requesting to be informed whether the ship "Ann McLister," laden with Russian produce, the property of British merchants, and waiting to leave the Port of Cronstadt for this country on the breaking-up of the winter, would be interrupted by the British squadron before any declaration of war took place; and, if so liable, what the steps the consignees should take, in order to avoid such detention or confiscation; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Cates' application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Favourable consideration.

That the case of the "Ann McLister" appears to me a favourable one for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

She sailed long before war was imminent, and put back, and was detained by accident. I am, of course, unable to say whether any instructions have been, or will be, given to the Baltic fleet which would provide for this or similar cases, or whether any general measure will be taken by Order in Council or otherwise.

I am also ignorant of the intention of Her Majesty's Government as to blockade, and whether, if established, it would be relaxed under any or what circumstances. I am, therefore, unable to advise what answer should be returned to Messrs. Cates, but it appears to me that such answer may be (generally) favourable.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 28, 1854.

WE are honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 10th instant, stating that, with reference to our Report of the 9th instant,* reporting our opinion on the case of the "Themis," he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague on the subject; and to request that we would take this despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, whether there is anything in this despatch to alter the Report already made by us on this case.

Fictitious sale of Russian vessel to an Ionian.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken into consideration the despatch above referred to, and have the honour to report—

That the circumstance referred to by the Consul in the above despatch certainly forms an additional ground of suspicion, but we do not think that it affords ground for impugning the validity of the sale from the Russian owner to the Ionian subject. We collect that the British Consul declines to recognize the transaction, on the ground that some regulation of Russian law or usage has not been complied with by the captain; but such non-compliance would not affect a bonâ fide sale in a foreign port; and, upon the whole, we cannot advise the British Consul, on the materials he possesses, to incur the responsibility of refusing the papers to the alleged Ionian purchaser.

My Lord,

Corn purchased in Russia by Dutch firms, and conveyed in Dutch vessels to Dutch ports.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the inclosed despatch from Sir James Turing, Her Majesty's Consul at Rotterdam, requesting instructions with reference to an application which has been made to him by some of the first mercantile firms in that city. Those firms, it is stated, some time since made large purchases of corn in the Russian Baltic ports, and having already chartered, or having occasion still to charter, Dutch vessels to bring the purchased corn to the Netherlands, they are desirous of knowing whether, in the event of war being declared, licenses will be granted to them by Her Majesty's Government to enable them, in their capacity as neutrals, freely to transport their corn from Russian ports in neutral vessels to the Netherlands, without molestation from British cruizers.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that we would take this question into our immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, what answer should, in our opinion, be returned to this application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

All right, if bonâ fide.

May be searched, &c.

That the applicants may be informed that except in case of a blockade, of which notice will be given, their goods shipped in neutral vessels from a Russian to a neutral port, bonâ fide in the ordinary course of trade, will not be exposed to molestation. The vessels will, of course, be liable to search by Her Majesty's ships, and to capture if any reasonable cause of suspicion should exist as to the true ownership or destination of the goods, or if contraband of war, or enemy's despatches should be found on board.

My Lord,

Declaration respecting neutrals.

Inquiries respecting.

HAVING yesterday received from your Lordship (marked Private and Immediate) a printed copy of Her Majesty's Declaration respecting neutrals, letters of marque, &c., also marked Confidential, I observe that the same document is published in the morning papers; but that version of it which is printed in the "Times" omits the following words, "or in transitu from one of the enemy's ports to the other," and stops at "contraband of war."

It also contains the addition of "Westminster, March 28," which is not in the copy sent to me.

Under these circumstances, I request either to be furnished with a correct copy or to be informed that the copy sent is correct, and that the version printed in the "Times" is erroneous.

I need scarcely point out to your Lordship the importance of my being furnished officially, as early as possible, with correct and authenticated copies of such documents, such as that called "Declaration of War," in the newspapers to-day, Proclamations, Orders in Council, &c., which I seldom receive at all, and never with any regularity.

P.S.—I have just perused the version of the Declaration printed in the Supplement to the "London Gazette" of the 28th, and I find that this version agrees with that printed in the "Times," and differs from that sent to me by your Lordship and marked "Confidential."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

See British Declaration in "London Gazette."

That Mr. Buchanan may be instructed to refer the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs to Her Majesty's Gracious Declaration, published in the Supplement to the "London Gazette," March 28th, which must remove all doubt upon the subject in question.

My Lord,

Onega Wood Company. Concessions in favour of

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 24th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. D. J. Morgan, Agent in this country to the Onega Wood Company, setting forth certain points bearing on the interests of the said Company with respect to which he is anxious to receive information; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Morgan.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—a matter of policy.

That the first question, viz., whether special instructions are to be issued to avoid all injury to the property of the Company (and thus, I presume, in effect to allow it to trade with the enemy without any restriction) is one exclusively for the decision of Her Majesty's Government.

I see no reason stated in favour of such a course being adopted which would not apply to nearly the whole trade carried on by British merchants established in Russia.

Exemption of Onega from blockade.

That the second question, viz., "Whether Port (so-called) of Onega, being such as described, should not be exempted from any blockade or consequences thereof," is also entirely for the decision of Her Majesty's Government.

Licences, and period allowed for entering and leaving after declaration of war.

That with respect to the third question, viz., "Whether, in case of war, licenses should not be granted to Her Majesty's subjects, under the circumstances herein named, to bring home their goods from Onega in neutral ships, or in such other way as the Admiralty laws recognize, without the same being subject to capture by Her Majesty's cruizers," it appears to me that it would be right and proper to grant licenses for the importation of all goods proved to have been actually bought and paid for by the merchants settled in England before they had any notice of war being imminent, and which they could not have countermanded afterwards before war, and to refuse such licenses in all other cases, but this is a question of policy rather than law, and one as to which each particular application would require distinctive consideration.

If, however, Her Majesty should be graciously pleased to grant to Russian vessels bound to England for a certain period the privilege of sailing from, and returning back to, Russian ports, this might possibly so apply to or affect the case of the Onega Company as to render any further concession to that Company unadvisable.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 14th ultimo, stating that with reference to my reports of the 11th and 12th of January last,[*] he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mrs. Smith and Mr. Bowen, containing a statement and protest of the owners of the "Howard," destroyed by the Russian forces at Sinope, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which should be taken about the protest, loss of cargo, &c., with reference to the present state of our relations with Russia.

The previous papers are herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No redress, war having broken out.

That the existing war with Russia will render it impossible to obtain compensation for the owners of the "Howard," and that they may be so informed, and the papers may be returned to them. I may perhaps observe that, with reference to my former reports, it appears that the "Howard" was lying just in the centre, but inshore, of the Turkish fleet, which was moored in a crescent, and that the immediate cause of her destruction was a Turkish frigate, which drifted foul of her.

Under these circumstances, the result of any application to the Russian Government would hardly have been, in my opinion, successful, even if peace had continued.

American vessel with neutral cargo bound for a blockaded port.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 24th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Lefevre and Co., requesting to know whether in the event of war an American vessel with a neutral cargo, sailing from America for St. Petersburgh before a declaration of war, would be permitted by the blockading squadron to proceed to Cronstadt, and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned to it.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Any breach of blockade renders liable to capture.

That I observe that Messrs. Lefevre and Co. put this question in an abstract form, and do not state that they have any interest in any particular ship or goods whatsoever. If they are London merchants they can scarcely be so ignorant as they pretend or assume to be on the point in question. Under these circumstances I submit to your Lordship's judgment whether they are fairly entitled to any specific answer. If, however, your Lordship considers it proper to answer their application fully, they may be informed that when once a vessel has been informed that any particular port to which she may be destined is blockaded, she will be liable to condemnation if she attempts to commit any breach of such blockade. The time when, or the place whence, she originally sailed, will not affect the question. She ought, in order to be safe, to abandon her destination immediately on receiving notice that it is a blockaded port, and the mere act of sailing with a destination to a blockaded port, after having received a formal notification that it is blockaded, will expose a vessel to condemnation.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the cargoes in question will not be confiscated merely by reason of their being composed of goods originally the growth or manufacture of Russia, provided that they are bonâ fide, and exclusively owned by neutrals. If, however, these goods should be entirely the produce of Russia, and are shipped on board British vessels (described as "now loading"), and not sailing until after the declaration of war, and especially if not sailing until after this should be known at Odessa, I cannot venture to say that such vessels might not be exposed to capture or detention, unless either a license or specific instructions be issued. The entire want of specification as to the dates and particulars of the transaction is worthy of remark, and under these circumstances this case may perhaps be properly referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Privy Council on Licenses.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 30th ultimo, stating that with reference to my Report of the 22nd,[*] relative to the bonds which the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs have been ordered to require shippers of warlike stores to give for their due delivery at the port of destination, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Treasury, in reply to one which your Lordship on the receipt of my Report caused to be addressed to that Department upon the subject of the bonds in question; and with reference to the explanations contained in that letter, Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would take the matter again into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

The letter from the Treasury, together with the two bonds, are herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have again taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot afford security against abuse.

That, provided it is strictly borne in mind that the bonds in question will not in themselves afford any security whatever that the articles in question will not reach either the enemy or the revolted subjects of the Sultan (to insure which other sufficient measures must be taken), there does not appear to me to be any objection to such bonds being required. I may, however, observe, that I cannot but think that "arms for Antwerp, to be used as patterns for an order for the African market" (which, it seems, are allowed by the Treasury to be exported under bond) would probably make equally good patterns for the Russian or Greek market, especially as it is suspected that considerable orders for such markets have been or are being executed in Belgium. This, however, is not a legal question, but one of fact and probability, and I do not presume to put my opinion forward on such a point against that of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, who (no doubt properly) conceive that their explanation will be "in every way satisfactory" to your Lordship.

Exemptions from capture. British Government cannot answer for French Government.

WITH reference to the numerous cases of applications from merchants to be relieved from the risk of capture which may be incurred by their ships and goods during the war, I respectfully submit to your Lordship's consideration the propriety of warning them in every case that Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to answer for the course which the French Government or its ships of war may think proper to adopt.

Mutual understanding.

I would further venture to suggest the expediency of forthwith coming to some understanding with the French Government both as to the general principles upon which, and as to the particular instances in which, licenses or specific instructions are or may be issued, in order to insure a uniform line of action on the part of both Governments in such cases, without which serious confusion, inconvenience, and mischief may result, inasmuch as a license from one belligerent will not protect the ship from capture by an ally in the war.

The same observations apply to the Turkish Government.

I would request to be furnished officially with correct copies of any Decree, Declaration, or other official documents which the French Government has already issued, or may hereafter issue, on these points.

Overland trade with Russia.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 18th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from Mr. W. H. Elder, containing certain queries with reference to the overland trade with Russia, in which he is interested, and to request that we would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer to be returned to Mr. Elder.

Mr. Addington is pleased to add, with reference to a remark from the Queen's Advocate, that the Foreign Office has no further information or instructions to give on the subject of this reference than are contained in Mr. Elder's letter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Property, not neutral, may be seized.

That the first question is so expressed as to be scarcely intelligible, but assuming that it is intended to inquire whether Russian produce brought overland into Prussia and shipped at a Prussian port for this country, would be liable to seizure, we are of opinion that it would be so liable, unless it should be boná fide neutral property.

Boná fide* trade with neutral in Russian goods legal.

2. We are of opinion that, though a British subject cannot trade with an enemy through a neutral, or make a neutral his agent for the purpose of such trade, it will be lawful for an English merchant to purchase Russian produce from a neutral subject resident, or trading in, a neutral state, and that the goods so purchased would be safe in their transit from such neutral state to this country, provided the goods were boná fide the property of the neutral at the time of the purchase.

All trade with enemy illegal.

3. That it will be equally illegal for a British subject to trade with the enemy, whether he sends or receives the goods by sea or overland, and whether a blockade of the enemy's ports does or does not exist.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon —(Received April 7.)

My Lord,
Doctors' Commons, April 6, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 27th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at St. Petersburgh, stating certain points in regard to blockade and neutral vessels, on which the British residents in that capital require information, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Her Majesty's Consul with reference to the measures now in contemplation, in regard to neutrals, as stated in the inclosed Declaration, which Her Majesty proposes to issue.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Queries respecting trade with the enemy.

That in this, as in many similar cases, I have to remark that the questions are put in a vague and abstract form, and that M. Cazalette, or whoever may be the writer of the accompanying letter dated St. Petersburgh 27th February / 11th March, 1854, and addressed to Mr. Consul Michele, does not state that he has any particular interest in any ships or goods whatsoever. It appears, moreover, that this "English gentleman," resident in the enemy's country and extensively engaged in commerce there, contemplates adhering to the enemy and trading between the enemy's country and Great Britain during the war, and that it is for this very purpose that he has the assurance to request information and assistance from your Lordship, through Her Majesty's Consul, at a time when he must have known that war was imminent; and it is to be remarked that Her Majesty's Consul does not appear to consider that there is any impropriety in encouraging and assisting British subjects in such a course.

Impolicy of answering.

Such a state of things does not appear to me to require any further comment, but I shall, I trust, be pardoned for stating explicitly my humble opinion of the impolicy of showing any indulgence to such persons, or even of answering such applications, and also the necessity for impressing upon Mr. Consul Michele some correct principles for his guidance, if he is to remain in Her Majesty's service.

This, however, is entirely a matter for your Lordship's decision, and I proceed to answer the questions as well as their very vague and general character will admit.

Licences only will protect. Residents in enemy's country are enemies, &c. Trade illegal.

First, the applicant, if he is to be answered at all, may be warned that nothing but a license from the Crown can exempt him or others continuing in the enemy's country from the consequences of adhering to, or trading or holding any intercourse with, the enemy, and that those who do not immediately withdraw from the enemy's country will be treated in all respects as enemies, although British subjects by birth, and that all trade and intercourse between belligerents is illegal, howsoever carried on, and all goods taken therein will be confiscated as a general principle.

Questions.—1 and 2. "Will neutral or English vessels which may have wintered in a Russian port or should arrive there previous to a declaration of blockade be allowed free egress by Her Majesty's cruizers in the event of a blockade being established before they are ready to sail? If so, what time will be allowed them to clear out?" and

(2). "Will such vessels be allowed to complete their cargoes and sail with them to any port to which they may be destined, or will a distinction be made between the vessels and their cargoes to the prejudice of the latter?"

Principles of blockade.

Egress in certain cases.

(1). When a blockade is established and notified, egress is just as much a breach of blockade as ingress, and primâ facie all vessels and their cargoes coming out of a blockaded port will be liable to capture, and it will be for the claimants to establish their innocence in each particular case. British and neutral vessels would probably be permitted to come out if without any lading; goods proved to have been bonâ fide purchased, and laden on board by friends or neutrals before the blockade began, will be released; all others will be condemned.

Breaches of blockade.

(2). The ship will, in every case of breach of blockade, be condemned, to whomsoever she may belong. The property on board (to whomsoever it may belong) will be primâ facie liable to condemnation; it will be for those who may claim it to establish their innocence of any design to break the blockade, which, in cases of egress, it will be difficult for them to do.

Distinction between British, neutral, or Russian property.

3rd question. "Will any distinction be made whether the property on board belong to a subject of Great Britain, Russia, or a neutral state?"

(3). No distinction will be made between British or neutral property, excepting whether it was purchased and laden before and after blockade. Russian property will be condemned for breach of blockade without reference to the time when it was laden.

The "Ann McLeister" (which I have already reported on, March 27th) and other special cases, will be provided for by license or by release in case of actual capture.

Fate of goods depends on ownership, not on origin.

Apart from any question of breach of blockade, the fate of merchandize will not depend upon its origin, or the manner in which it was conveyed to the port from whence it may be shipped, but upon the answer to the question "who is the true owner or person interested therein, and what is its true destination," and its fate will be decided accordingly, if there be no breach of blockade.

Russian property on neutral vessels safe, &c.

Russian property, not contraband of war, will (except in cases of blockade) be perfectly safe under Her Majesty's Declaration, if laden on board neutral vessels, but British property taken trading with the enemy will be confiscated under whatever it may be sailing, and whether it has performed, or is intended to perform, part of its transit to or from the enemy's country overland, will be immaterial. What may be the fate of ships or goods captured by the French I am unable to say.

Wishart and Son, of Leith, respecting the case of the brig "Ocean Bride," of Dundee, expected to be dispatched from the White Sea with a cargo of Russian produce consigned to Messrs. Wishart.

Mr. Addington is pleased to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as the "Ocean Bride" is stated to have sailed from Archangel in October last, and to have been stranded, and ever since unavoidably detained, this appears to me to be a very proper case for the granting of a license, even in the event of the ports in the White Sea being blockaded. Probably your Lordship may consider it a proper case for reference to the Committee on Licenses.

M. Smith respecting some cargoes of timber now waiting to be shipped on British account at Riga, together with the previous correspondence with that gentleman, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Smith's inquiry whether these goods should be shipped as British, Dutch, or Russian property, it being proposed to ship them in Dutch vessels.

Mr. Addington is pleased to request my opinion whether it would not in future be well to refer all applicants to the Committee of Privy Council, which will be formed for the consideration of cases entitled Licenses.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Refer to Committee of Privy Council on Licences.

That this case appears to me one which may properly be referred to the Committee on Licences. It will be for your Lordship to consider whether all similar applications should be likewise so referred, or whether it should previously be ascertained that they are proper cases for such reference.

The timber in question appears to be British property, purchased long before the war was probable, but nothing is distinctly stated as to the opportunity for countermanding.

Licence must state if blockade may be broken.

It should be distinctly settled in all these cases whether or not the license is to include the privilege of breaking blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Addington's letter of the 25th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Messrs. Bell, of Dundee, requesting certain information with respect to some flax belonging to that firm, at present waiting for shipment at Riga, and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this case appears to me to be fit for reference to the Committee on Licenses.

Russian property in neutral vessels may pass blockade in certain cases.

It is to be remarked that the flax in question would, if enemy's property, be allowed to pass in neutral vessels by virtue of Her Majesty's Declaration, and even in case of blockade, if laden before the blockade. Her Majesty's Declaration, however, has not permitted any trading with the enemy by British merchants. Whether this property will be condemned if captured without a license will, in a great measure, depend upon dates and particulars. Messrs. Bell give no particulars as to the date of the purchase, or of the lading, or as to what opportunity they had of countermanding, and they should, I conceive, be required to furnish full and detailed information on these points before the propriety of granting a license is considered.

The answer to be returned should, in my opinion, be confined to requiring full information on these points.

Prussian trading vessels running between Stettin and Cronstadt.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a memorandum which was communicated to your Lordship by the Prussian Minister at this Court, putting certain questions as to whether, so long as Cronstadt is not blockaded, the steam vessels belonging to the Berlin Sea Trading Company, which run between Stettin and Cronstadt, would be allowed to carry the ordinary passengers, goods, and postal correspondence, and to request that I would take this Memorandum into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the reply which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the Memorandum into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Prussian Minister may be informed that—

If neutral property, and not carrying British or French goods, not liable to capture.

"1. As long as Cronstadt is not blockaded, can those packets continue to carry ordinary passengers and goods, contraband of war of course (officers and soldiers included) excepted." Provided that the packets are the entire and exclusive property of neutrals, and that they have not on board any British or French property trading with the enemy, they will not, under the circumstances stated, be liable to capture.

"2. Can they carry the ordinary postal correspondence, that is to say, letters not Russian Government despatches, or can they carry no letters whatsoever?"

Risk attending carriage of letters.

They will not be forbidden to carry any letters whatsoever, but they carry all letters at their own risk, whether by way of postal correspondence or otherwise; a single letter on the enemy's public service will expose the vessels to great risk of capture, and it will depend on the circumstances of each particular case whether she will be condemned or not.

It may probably be advisable to send instructions to Sir Charles Napier on the subject of these packets, and to direct the attention of the French Government, and Her Majesty's Consul at Stettin to the subject.

The previous correspondence is herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the subject into consideration and have the honour to report—

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Berlin, and to request that we would take this despatch into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the instructions to be given to Her Majesty's Agents abroad with respect to false sales of Russian vessels to subjects of neutral countries, and as to the proceedings of Russian merchants in forwarding Russian produce to Memel for shipment to this country through the medium of Russian merchants at that port.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That a neutral cannot be allowed to act as agent to a belligerent in the colourable transfer of either ships or goods.

Both illegal.

If the sale of either ships or goods is made by an enemy to a neutral with any reservation of property or interest therein to the enemy, either avowed or upon a secret trust or contract for repurchase, such ships or goods will, notwithstanding such colourable sale, be liable to be captured and condemned as prize.

My Lord,

Blockade of the Baltic.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter, with its inclosure from the Admiralty, and a despatch, together with its inclosure, from Mr. Buchanan, Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, respecting the departure of the fleet under Vice-Admiral Sir C. Napier, on the 11th instant, from Kioge Bay for the Gulf of Finland, to place in a state of blockade all the Russian ports in the Baltic and in the Gulf of Finland and Bothnia; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion whether their contents would warrant Her Majesty's Government in announcing an effective blockade of the ports in question.

Mr. Hammond is further pleased to request that I would draw up a proper notice for insertion in the "Gazette," if I am of opinion that the blockade should now be officially notified.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Must not notify as effective until it has actually taken place.

That I am of opinion that neither the letter of Sir C. Napier to Mr. Buchanan of the 11th April, nor that of Mr. Buchanan to M. de Blukme of the 12th of April, will of themselves justify Her Majesty's Government in announcing that an effective blockade of the whole of the Russian ports in the Baltic and in the Gulfs of Finland and Bothnia has been established. Her Majesty's Government have, in my humble opinion, the strongest motives for not furnishing any precedent as to blockade which might hereafter be used against the interests of Great Britain, and for adhering strictly to the established principles of international law on this subject. One of the clearest of these principles is that a declaration of blockade, unaccompanied or unsupported by the fact of the actual presence of a competent force, does not establish a blockade, and all Decrees and Orders declaring extensive coasts and countries in a state of blockade, without the presence of an adequate naval force to support it, are manifestly illegal, and have no sanction in international law, See especially the cases of the "Mercurius" and of "The Betsey," 1 C. Robinson.

It is to be observed, 1st, that Sir C. Napier only expresses a design or intention to establish a blockade thereafter, without fixing any date from which he expected that such a blockade would be effectively established.

2nd. That he was obviously not in a position to establish such a blockade effectively at the moment of his sailing from Kioge Bay, nor would he be in such a position for some time after sailing therefrom.

3rd. That it is hardly possibly that so extensive a blockade as that contemplated should become completely and equally effective as to all the ports and coasts in question precisely at the same time.

Whensoever the blockading force shall have arrived off any one or more of the ports in question, it will proceed (even in the absence of any public notification) to warn off all vessels which may be bound thereto, or may attempt to enter them, and any vessel persisting, after such warning, in an attempt to enter, or continuing her voyage for such ports, will be liable to capture. I do not see, therefore, that any very serious mischief can result from a postponement of the proposed notification. If, however, it should be deemed necessary by Her Majesty's Government immediately to publish a notification of the proposed blockade, I can only suggest that a day should be named for its commencement, upon which it is almost certain, after making fair allowance for accidental delay, that the blockading force would be on the spot, and that there should be a distinct notification of the fact and the date of the blockade, without any reference to Sir C. Napier's letter. I do not, however, wish to be understood as advising any such steps which may not improbably give rise to international difficulties with neutrals.

I have, &c.

No. 78.

The Law Officers of the Crown to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

Doctors' Commons, April 21, 1854.

My Lords,

THE Queen's Proctor has laid before us Captain Hamilton's letter of the 17th of April, in which he states that he is commanded by your Lordships to transmit to us therewith the questions which have been put to the British Government by the Dutch Minister, together with the answers which have been given by the French Government to the same questions, and to request that we will advise what answers be given to these questions; that they cannot be the same as those of France, for the doctrine of Great Britain with reference to the "right of search," and the mode of exercising it, are different. Moreover, with regard to "contraband of war," it may probably be expedient to enumerate the articles specified by the French Government, adding to the enumeration any articles omitted by them, but contained in the Article on this head in the Treaties of neutrality with Sweden and Denmark; but that, together with this specification, it will be prudent to insist upon a general reservation regarding articles of a doubtful character, such as coal, hemp, marine steam engines, and their component parts, which may be applied to purposes either of commerce or war. That your Lordships conceive that the doctrine for which the British Government ought to contend is that laid down by Sir W. Scott with respect to these uncertain articles, viz., that each case must be decided with a due regard to the attendant circumstances, such as the port of destination, the parties to whom the captured articles are consigned, the probable cause for believing the special use to which they are about to be applied, that the warlike or commercial character of these articles can be safely tested in no other manner.

Right of search.

Definition of contraband of war.

We have accordingly taken the papers into consideration, and we have the honour to state that we entirely concur with the opinions thus expressed by your Lordships with respect to contraband of war.

With reference to the questions as put in writing by his Excellency the Netherlands' Minister, we have to remark—

1. That we cannot advise that any limitation whatever to the right of visit and search of all vessels on the high seas by Her Majesty's ships of war should be admitted. It is thus defined and justified by Sir W. Scott, in the case of "Maria, Paulsen," 1 C. Robinson, page 163:—"The right of visiting and searching merchant ships upon the high seas, whatever be the ships, whatever be the cargo, whatever be the destinations, is an incontestible right of the lawfully commissioned cruizers of a belligerent nation; and this, be the ships, the cargo, and the destinations what they may, because, until they are visited and searched, it does not appear what the ships, or the cargoes, or the destinations, are." Nevertheless, we deem it right to invite your Lordships' particular attention to the Order in Council of the 15th of April, 1854, which, although it cannot be considered as waiving or abandoning the right of visitation or search, must, in practice, very materially affect its exercise, and will greatly reduce the number of instances in which it can be safely or properly insisted upon.

No limitation to right of search.

Extent of search.

2. This right will be exercised in the manner hitherto practised by Her Majesty's ships in all former wars. It will not be abused or vexatiously used, but it cannot be confined merely to ascertaining the national character of the ship. It will be extended to all other material circumstances connected with the ship, those on board her, her cargo, and destination; as, for instance, whether there are on board articles contraband of war destined for the enemy's use, or any persons in the military or naval service of the enemy, or whether any breach of blockade has been committed, or is intended; a mere inspection of the ship's papers will not in all cases suffice.

Convoy cannot protect from search.

3. The presence or convoy of a man-of-war of her nation will not exempt any vessels from being visited or searched by Her Majesty's ships, and if resistance to this undoubted belligerent right should be resorted to, capture and condemnation will, under the general law of nations, ensue thereupon.

Definition of contraband of war.

4. Contraband of war will be held to include (1) all articles which are solely or chiefly employed for purposes of war, such as arms, ammunition, military and naval stores, articles of equipment, accoutrements, and so forth; (2) all other articles of a doubtful character ("Aucipitis usus"), i. e., all articles which, though capable of use for peaceable purposes, are also capable of use for warlike purposes. The nature, considered, and if these be such as to render it probable that they are, in any particular case, intended for the naval and military use of the enemy, they will be treated as con- destination, origin, and other circumstances attending upon such articles, will be duly traband of war; ships' timber and naval stores, and naval steam machinery, will be of this character, with respect to which we entirely concur in the doctrine of Lord Stowell alluded to by Captain Hamilton; (3) all the articles mentioned in any particular Treaty so far as regards the state with which such Treaty exists; (4) coal will, in our opinion, be in all cases of this doubtful character, and may be, under the circumstances above alluded to, clearly treated as contraband of war.

British Consular seal and signature to Swedish ships' papers.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 13th instant, stating that he was directed to inclose to me a despatch from Mr. Pringle, Her Majesty's Consul at Stockholm, dated the 31st ultimo, reporting that he had been requested by several owners of Swedish merchant-vessels which were loading at that port, and many of them ready to go to sea, to attach his name and seal of office as Her Majesty's Consul to the papers of the several ships in addition to the certificate of the Swedish authorities; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether Mr. Pringle should comply with the request of the Swedish merchants or not.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Should not be sanctioned.

That, inasmuch as Mr. Pringle does not state either the object or purpose for which he is requested to attach his name and seal of office to Swedish ships' papers, or that any British interests are to be affected thereby, or what effect such signature and seal may have if attached, or any reason why he should so attach them, I am of opinion that he should be instructed not to attach his name and seal of office to Swedish or any other foreign ships' papers, at all events until some further information can be obtained on these points, but to confine himself strictly to the discharge of his Consular duties to British ships and British subjects.

Exportation of wood from Russia by French subject of Nantes.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from Count Walewski, the French Ambassador at this Court (dated April 4, 1854), respecting an application of M. Harmauge, of Nantes, to be allowed to export wood from Russia; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to what effect the new Order in Council will have as regards such an application, with reference to the answer which will have to be returned to Count Walewski's note.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May pass under Order in Council.

That Count Walewski may be informed that if the cargoes of these vessels were transshipped into neutral vessels such cargoes might pass without molestation to any port in France, under Her Majesty's recent Order in Council; even in case of blockade they could be permitted to leave Russian ports, having been laden before the blockade and in time of peace.

That, even without transshipment, Her Majesty's Government would probably feel disposed to issue instructions to allow to these vessels bound to a French port the same indulgence which would be extended to them by the Order in Council of 15th April, if they were bound to a British port, provided always that they sail before the 15th of May, that is to say, to allow them to land their cargoes and return to any non-blockaded port.

That these extensive concessions appear to be sufficient for all commercial purposes, and that, Her Majesty's Government having hitherto abstained from issuing any special licenses, I do not see any sufficient reason for deviating from this practice in the present instance.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th instant stating that, with reference to my Report of the 31st ultimo,* on the application of the Onega Wood Company for license to trade with Russia during the war, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a note from the French Ambassador at this Court (dated April 5, 1854) upon the same subject; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to what effect the new Order in Council will have as regards the application of that Company to be allowed to bring away their wood from Russia.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Conditional and temporary trade with Russia is allowed by Order in Council.

That the effect of the new Orders in Council will be to permit either the Onega Wood Company, or any other persons in Russia, to import their goods into British, French, or neutral ports in neutral ships, unless and until the port at which such goods may be embarked shall be blockaded, in which case neutral ships would probably be allowed free egress, provided they had no goods on board but such as were laden before the blockade.

The recent Orders in Council will further permit the importation of such goods into any British port, even in Russian ships, and the safe return of such ships, provided they sail from ports of Russia in the Baltic or White Sea before the 15th of May.

Under these circumstances it does not appear to me that any special licenses or instructions are required in this matter.

Russian produce coming through Prussia not liable to capture.

That Messrs. Staig and Stuart may be informed that Her Majesty's Declaration of the 28th of March regarding neutrals is to be applied in favour of vessels under a neutral flag which may now leave an unblockaded Russian port; and with reference to the further question contained in their letter (which refers to your Lordship's reply to Mr. H. W. Elder, dated the 12th instant), they may be informed that under and by virtue of the Order in Council of the 15th April (issued subsequent to the date of your Lordship's letter to Mr. Elder), Russian produce brought overland into Prussia, and shipped at a Prussian port for this country, will not be liable to seizure.

My Lord,

American ship bound for St. Petersburgh.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Schlottner, requesting to be informed whether the American ship "Mary Annah," laden with property belonging to his house at New Orleans, and destined for St. Petersburgh, will be allowed to proceed to its destination unmolested; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned to Mr. Schlottner.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May enter until blockaded.

That Mr. Schlottner may be informed that the American barque "Mary Annah" will, by virtue or Her Majesty's recent Order in Council (April 15), be permitted to proceed to her destination (St. Petersburgh) unmolested, unless and until that port shall be blockaded, and the "Mary Annah" shall either have been warned off by the blockading force, or shall have had due notice of such blockade; but that if she should persist after such warning or notice in endeavouring to enter that or other blockaded port she will be liable to capture and condemnation, according to the law of nations, as administered without exception in all such cases in the Prize Courts of the United States as well as those of Great Britain.

My Lord,

Russian vessels in neutral ports.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Unorius and Paton, in which, with reference to the case of three Finnish vessely at present at Antwerp, they request to be informed whether the Proclamation of March 29 extends to Russian vessels in neutral ports.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Unorius and Paton.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Liable to capture on high seas.

That I observe that Messrs. Unorius and Paton do not state that they are interested in the Russian vessels in question; subject to this observation they may be informed that neither the Order in Council of the 29th March, nor that of the 15th April, extend to Russian vessels in neutral ports, and that the vessels in question will be liable to capture on the high seas.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 13th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying note from the Belgian Minister at this Court, requesting to be furnished with certain information with respect to the licences to be granted by Her Majesty's Government to vessels carrying Belgian produce, and request that we would take M. Van de Weyer's note into consideration, and to report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Belgian vessels from Russian Black Sea ports, and ditto bound for Berdiansk for cargo, protected by Order in Council.

That the Belgian Minister may be informed, in answer to his note, that in the cases which are first mentioned by him of Belgian vessels freighted from ports in the Black Sea with cargoes of Russian produce for Belgium, no licences will be necessary, as the ships will be protected by the last Order in Council of the 15th instant.

Vessel to Africa and back must have licence.

That in the secondly mentioned case of a Belgian ship freighted with a cargo for Constantinople, and intending to proceed thence to Berdiansk for a cargo, such vessel will also be protected by the same Order, provided she does not attempt to break any effective blockade. But that in the case of the Russian vessel chartered by the Belgian house for a voyage from Antwerp to the coast of Africa and back, such vessel (unless licensed) will be liable to capture, but her cargo, if bonâ fide Belgian property, will be released.

Rights of Russian subjects remaining in England during war by Her Majesty's permission.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands contained in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to state to us that Mr. Krehmer, the Russian Consul-General, called at the Foreign Office on the 12th instant with the view of ascertaining how far the permission granted by Her Majesty, as stated in the inclosed despatch to Mr. Michell, Her Majesty's Consul at St. Petersburgh, to Russian subjects to continue to reside in this country in perfect security, and unmolested in their persons and property, provided they conformed to the law, and did not perform any acts forbidden to British subjects, would admit of their enjoying the British law in their ordinary transactions, and specifically in prosecuting their suits in the British Courts, from which under ordinary circumstances alien enemies would be debarred.

Mr. Hammond also stated that we would see by the inclosed despatch from Mr. Michell that he had made the communication to the Russian Government prescribed to him by your Lordship.

He concluded by stating he was to request that we would take the point adverted to by Mr. Krehmer into consideration, and to report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon at our earliest convenience.

In obedience to your Lordship's command we have taken the several documents transmitted to us into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

May prosecute their suits in the British Courts of Justice.

That aliens resident in this country by permission of the Crown are by our law regarded as owing allegiance to the Crown in return for the protection they enjoy, although their Sovereign is at war with this country, and are entitled to the protection and benefit of British law; and their actions or suits in our Courts of Justice could not be met by the plea of alien enemy.

The Russian Consul, therefore, may be informed that, notwithstanding the war, Russian subjects permitted to reside in this country will, whilst they conform to British law, enjoy the full protection of that law in their ordinary transactions, and will have the full right of prosecuting their suits in the British Courts of Justice, to obtain the benefit of all lawful contracts, in the same manner as they would have been entitled to do if war had not broken out between the two countries.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 17th instant, stating that with reference to his letter of the 8th, inclosing for our opinion a letter from the Agent and Consul-General of the Hans Towns, requesting to be informed in what manner a Russian vessel en route with a cargo for Bremen will be dealt with, he was directed to transmit to us a further letter on the same subject which has been received from Mr. Colquhoun; and to request that we would take the letters into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the reply to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the letters into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Russian vessels from British or French port may go to an unblockaded Russian port.

If to a neutral port to take in cargo, may be captured.

Russian vessels from neutral ports may be captured.

That in answer to Mr. Colquhoun's inquiries, which are not very distinctly expressed, it may be sufficient to state that Russian vessels which have cleared out from a British or French port since the declaration of war will be allowed to proceed direct on their voyage home, that is, to any Russian port not under blockade, without being liable to capture, but that if any such Russian vessel, having so left a British or French port, shall go to a neutral port, and take on board a neutral cargo, she will be liable to capture. Further, Mr. Colquhoun may be informed that, according to the declarations and orders which have been issued up to the present time by the English and French Governments, Russian vessels which have cleared out of neutral ports since the declaration of war with neutral cargoes, bound either to Russian or neutral ports, will not be protected from capture, although the cargoes of neutral property will be released.

Russian vessel from Sandwich Islands to British port to take in cargo for Bremen.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying letter from Mr. Colquhoun, Agent and Consul-General of the Hans Towns, requesting permission for a Russian vessel, on its way from the Sandwich Islands to Cowes or Falmouth, to take orders from those ports, and to proceed with its cargo to Bremen, to which port the owner of the cargo belongs; and to request that we would take Mr. Colquhoun's letter, with its inclosures, into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the reply to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot grant licence.

That we are of opinion that the answer to be returned to Mr. Colquhoun should be that his request cannot be complied with.

The extent of the indulgence to be afforded to Russian merchant vessels bound to British ports is settled and determined by the Order in Council.

Neutral cargo would be restored by Admiralty Court.

The property of neutrals is now protected to a degree unparalleled in the history of European warfare. It is admitted by Mr. Colquhoun that the neutral cargo on board the "Suomi" would, in case of capture, be restored on application to the Admiralty Court. It is too much to ask that, to secure the neutral against the possible expense of an application to the Court, protection should be afforded to an enemy's ship to which it would otherwise not be entitled.

My Lord,

Russian vessels quitting French or neutral ports not protected by British Declaration.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th instant, stating that in our Report of the 15th instant,* on certain questions proposed by Mr. Krehmer, the Russian Consul-General; we state that the answer to be returned should be that Russian merchant ships quitting a neutral or French port will not be within the protection afforded by Her Majesty's recent Declaration to Russian ships quitting a British port.

That your Lordship, however, directs Mr. Hammond to observe to us that as the English and French Governments have agreed together that Russian vessels should be allowed freely to depart from English and French ports until the 9th or 10th of May, it would seem that the respective Governments are bound to carry out that agreement as regards their respective ports, though that is not the case as regards neutral ports.

Your Lordship requests, therefore, that we would reconsider the case with reference to what Mr. Hammond has now stated, and report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon at out earliest convenience.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

British and French agreement at variance with British Declaration, which should be amended.

That as the license allowed to Russian vessels in or bound to the ports of France or England to discharge their cargoes, and depart before the 10th of May unmolested, is the result of mutual agreement between England and France, it is according to the spirit of that agreement that a Russian ship which has quitted a French port by virtue of such license, and is returning direct to her own country, should be protected from English cruizers and vice versâ, but such is not the language of the English Order in Council, or of the French Ordonnance; and if it be resolved, therefore, to carry out the agreement between France and England to the extent of protecting the Russian vessel which within the allowed time has cleared out of the port of the one country from the cruizers of the other, it will be necessary either to publish an additional Declaration, or to give instructions to that effect to the Commanders of the vessels of war of France and England.

Russian vessels clearing out from neutral ports are not within the order or the agreement between the two countries in which that order originated.

My Lord,

Russian vessel and armament at Shields, purchased by a British subject.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Board of Customs, requesting to be informed as to the course which should be pursued with regard to the armament of a Russian vessel taken by the Custom-house officers at the port of Shields on the 1st instant, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and favour your Lordship at my earliest convenience with a report upon this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

If bonâ fide, the sale is valid, and the armament of ship belongs to the purchaser.

That the sale and purchase of this Russian ship (the "Odero") by a British subject (of the particulars of which I have no information), if made "bonâ fide and duly completed in the ordinary legal form to the satisfaction of the officers of the Customs, will be legal, as decided by the Law Officers in the case of the "Norden" at Waterford,† and it will be their duty under the circumstances to deliver to the purchaser or to his order the armaments in question as belonging to the ship, taking his receipt for the same.

I give this opinion in ignorance of the particular authority, or orders, under which the officers of the Customs acted in this case in taking and keeping possession of the armaments alone, and as distinguished from the ship; but I conceive it to be their duty, in the absence of any special circumstances, to act in this case as they would do in any similar case of the regular and legal purchase by a British subject of any foreign merchant vessel lying in a British harbour; and I presume that in such a case they would deliver up any arms or articles belonging to such ships to the purchaser.

Appropriation of prizes and disposal of prisoners.

WE have had before us Captain Hamilton's letter to Her Majesty's Proctor, dated the 24th instant, and the drafts of Conventions transmitted therewith, respecting the appropriation of prizes and the disposal of prisoners made by the combined forces of England and France agreed upon by Lord Cowley and by Rear-Admiral Dundas, and also the Instructions to the Naval Commanders of both nations in pursuance of the Conventions, and signifying your Lordship's directions that our opinion should be taken on these drafts, and especially whether the execution of any of the stipulations thereof would be attended with difficulty with reference to the present arrangements of the British Admiralty Courts and the principles by which they are guided.

We have the honour to report that we have taken the papers into our consideration.

Opinion on Draft Convention and Instructions.

We are of opinion that the execution of some of the stipulations of the Prizes Convention and of some of the Articles of the Instructions will be attended with difficulty with reference to the present arrangements of British Admiralty and other Courts, and the principles by which they are guided.

For instance, Instruction No. 5, directing the delivering up of prizes in certain cases to Consuls in neutral ports, will, in the case of British Consuls at least, give rise to serious legal difficulties.

These difficulties may, in our opinion, be obviated either by the insertion of clauses in the Prize Act or by some other legislative enactment.

It will not have escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government that the case, either of Turkey or of any other allies, is not provided for, although Her Majesty's Proclamation of the 29th March for the distribution of captures, alluded to in Section 5 of the proposed Prize Act, appears to contemplate a distribution amongst allies generally.

My Lord,

Armaments and ammunition carried by merchantmen for self-defence.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch, which your Lordship has received from Sir James Turing, Her Majesty's Consul at Rotterdam, in which he states that several mercantile firms and shipowners of eminence at that port have applied to him for advice as to the course which it would be advisable for them to pursue under existing circumstances with regard to the shipment of arms and ammunition on board their vessels for purposes of self-defence, more especially with regard to those ships engaged in trade to remote quarters of the globe which have been accustomed to carry a considerable armament. Sir James Turing adds that it is apprehended by the Netherland shipowners that, if their vessels were visited at sea by British or French cruisers, their armament might be considered as much larger than necessary as to expose their ships and property to serious inconvenience and loss, and his despatch contains suggestions for averting this danger, as well as for insuring the bonâ fide nature of the cargo loaded; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that I would take this despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which it would be proper to instruct Sir James Turing to return to the applications for advice which have been addressed to him in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That there does not appear to me to exist any cause to apprehend that any interruption will be offered to the Netherlands vessels in question by Her Majesty's ships, and that Sir James Turing may be so instructed.

Contraband of war must be proved to be destined for enemy.

"Contraband of war" must be proved to be destined for the enemy's use, in order to be liable to confiscation, and neutral vessels going to Africa or other ports remote from the seat of war may freely carry and trade in arms and ammunition.

Your Lordship will judge of the expediency of so informing the Dutch merchants, or of merely stating generally that they will not be molested under the circumstances stated, and that no additional papers or Consular certificates will be required.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 27th instant, stating that, with reference to our letter of the 26th instant,* reporting our opinion as to certain questions asked by the Belgian Minister at this Court with respect to licenses, he was directed to transmit to us again M. Van de Weyer's note, and to point out to us that Mr. Van de Weyer's first question relates to "des licenses pour des navires Belges, Anglais, Autrichiens, Hollandais, et Danois," but that our Report refers only to the case of Belgian vessels; and to request that we would take the note of M. Van de Weyer into our further and immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship at our earliest convenience our opinion as to the other cases above mentioned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this case into our further consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Dutch, Austrian, Danish, and any other friendly or neutral ships, will be treated in the same manner and entitled to the same privileges as to trading with any non-blockaded port of the enemy as Belgian ships.

British ships may not communicate with enemy's ports, open or blockaded.

That British ships are expressly forbidden by Her Majesty's Order in Council of the 15th April to enter or communicate with any enemy's port or any port in the occupation of the enemy, whether open or blockaded, and that their so doing will expose them to capture and condemnation.

My Lord,

Neutral flag on high seas. Neutral property in Russian territory.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 24th ultimo, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 20th March last,* containing a report upon the letter addressed to your Lordship by the Agent and Consul-General of the Hanse Towns, requesting to know the intentions of the British and French Governments with respect to the flag of neutrals on the high seas, and the property of neutrals within the territories of Russia, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a further correspondence on the same subject which has been received from Mr. Colquhoun and from Colonel Hodges, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Hamburgh; and to request that, in taking the same into consideration, I would report to your Lordship whether, under existing circumstances, my Report of the 20th March would now be a proper reply to the applications made to Her Majesty's Government on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the further correspondence into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am of opinion that my Report of the 20th March would now be as proper a reply to the applications made to Her Majesty's Government on this subject as it was at that date.

Law of blockade is unaltered.

Her Majesty, both in her Declaration of the 28th March and in the subsequent Orders in Council, has hitherto maintained her belligerent rights as to blockade in all their integrity, and has not made any concessions whatever as to blockaded ports. The law of nations, in all that relates to blockade, will therefore (it is to be presumed) be administered in British Prize Courts precisely as it has hitherto been administered.

Blockades. Lord Stowell on.

By this law blockade is broken by egress as much as by ingress, and all cargoes coming out of a blockaded port are primâ facie liable to capture. They will only be restored on its being proved that they were bonâ fide purchased and laden on board before the blockade was established, or that they were neutral property brought into the port before the blockade and withdrawn bonâ fide by the neutral owner (as being found unsaleable or otherwise); in which latter case their reshipment during the blockade would probably not prevent their restoration. "A blockade," says Lord Stowell, in the "Voum Judith," 1 C. Robinson, 152, "is intended to suspend the entire commerce of the place, and a neutral is no more at liberty to assist the traffic of exportation than of importation. The utmost that can be allowed to a neutral vessel is, that, having already taken on board a cargo before the blockade begins, she may be at liberty to retire with it, but it must be considered as a rule which this Court means to apply that a neutral ship departing can only take away a cargo bonâ fide purchased and delivered before the commencement of the blockade. If she afterwards takes on board a cargo it is a fraudulent act and a violation of the blockade."

Such was the law of nations in the late war, and such, in my opinion, it still remains.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest that the observations which I ventured to offer in my former Report against the concessions sought, appear to me to have derived great additional strength from circumstances occurring since the date thereof.

1st. From the very extensive concessions which Her Majesty and her ally have recently made in favour of neutral and commercial interests in general, and which are calculated infinitely to diminish the serious evils which neutrals might reasonably have apprehended on the 20th March from the impending war.

2nd. From the fact that, up to this day, I am not aware of any single Russian port having been actually blockaded.

Any concession should be extended to all neutrals.

It is obvious, therefore, that, in a large number of cases, Hanseatic citizens and other neutrals may (if acting with due diligence) have laden their cargoes on board before any blockade had been established. I therefore adhere generally to my former Report, and I can only repeat that, so far as this is a question of policy, I cannot express an opinion, not being in possession of the views of Her Majesty's Government on the question. If the concession sought for is to be made, it should, in my humble opinion, be general; should be extended to all neutrals, and limited in point of time by a fixed date, so as to avoid the frauds and abuses which are always to be apprehended from the issuing of licenses in individual cases.

I may add that, in all cases which may appear entitled to favourable consideration, the belligerent Government may at once release the prize after capture, which appears to me a mode of dealing with neutral claims much to be preferred to that of granting a license to individuals, or undertaking beforehand not to capture individual vessels.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That the Memorandum appears to me to be a correct statement of the doctrines of the Prize Courts of the United States upon neutral rights, which, on all essential points, is identical with that of the English Prize Courts.

Her Majesty may resume such belligerent rights as she has at present waived.

That I apprehend that, although Her Majesty has, by her Declaration and Orders of Council, waived and modified for the present in favour of neutrals the exercise of her undoubted belligerent rights, yet that she has by no means abandoned or renounced the exercise of such rights permanently or irrevocably; that it will be competent to her, as well as to her ally, at any time after due notice, to resume and to insist upon the full and vigorous exercise of all or any of the rights commonly admitted to belong to belligerents in relation to neutrals as well as to enemies. It will be for your Lordship to decide upon the expediency of making any communication on the subject to the Government of the United States, or to any other Government.

My Lord,

I HAVE to state to your Excellency, in reply to your despatch of the 6th ultimo, that the Circular despatch of the 10th March, to which you allude, was specially directed against a practice which was accidentally brought under my notice, of formal Certificates of Permission to enlist in foreign service being granted by one at least of Her Majesty's Ministers abroad to British subjects applying for the same. But such formal permission can only be given by the Crown, and therefore persons seeking to obtain formal permissions can only do so by applying to the Crown through the usual channel.

In some foreign services, I have reason to know, the applicant for employment must show that he has obtained the formal permission of his Government; but where that condition does not apply I apprehend that Her Majesty's Ministers abroad cannot interfere to prevent a British subject from accepting a Commission at his own risk from a foreign Sovereign. Her Majesty's Ministers indeed cannot formally permit a British subject to accept a Commission, but I am not aware that they have any authority to proceed against a British subject in a foreign country for doing so; nor is it any part of their duty to interfere in the matter.

My Lord,

Sale of Finland vessel "Vesta."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Messrs. Alcenius and Co., in which they request to be informed whether a Finland barque, the "Vesta," which has discharged a cargo in the port of London, can be sold to a British subject, and take out a British register. That Messrs. Alcenius also request that, in case such transfer cannot be effected, the captain of the "Vesta" may be furnished with a letter or other document ensuring the ship against capture and seizure on a voyage from hence to an unblockaded or neutral port.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Alcenius.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1853-56

If bonâ fide, is legal.

That, in accordance with the report of the Law Officers on the case of the Russian vessel "Norden" (dated April 18), the sale of this vessel, the "Vesta," if made bonâ fide, will be legal and valid.

I must, however, venture to suggest to your Lordship that it may be sufficient to inform Messrs. Alcenius that it is not your Lordship's intention to interfere at all in this case, and that questions relating to the registration of ships ought to be addressed to the Customs Department.

My Lord,

Ionian vessels fetching cargoes from Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Melas, Brothers, containing certain queries with respect to the case of two vessels under the Ionian flag, chartered by their house to bring away some cargoes from the Black Sea; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

They may take cargoes from any unblockaded ports.

That I assume that the vessels in question, said to be "under the Ionian flag," are not either British or Russian vessels, but bonâ fide Ionian vessels, and that Messrs. Melas, Brothers, may be informed that, if this be so, unless the port in the Sea of Azoff (not named), at which the Ionian vessels in question were to take their cargoes, should be blockaded by the naval forces of Her Majesty or of her allies, neither the vessels nor their cargoes will be molested on their homeward voyage therefrom to this country. Such a course of trade will be legal under the Order in Council of April 15, and they will be entitled to the same protection as they would receive under ordinary circumstances.

My Lord,

Vessels of a Lubeck Company having Russian members.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the Agent and Consul-General of the Hans Towns, conveying the request of the Government of Lubeck to be informed whether the vessels belonging to a company to which Russian subjects are admissible, and which have hitherto traded between the port of Lubeck to certain Russian ports, and which have been navigated under the Lubeck flag, would be treated as neutrals, or whether licenses would be granted to them to protect them against any risk of seizure; and to request that we would take Mr. Colquhoun's letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the reply to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken Mr. Colquhoun's letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Treated as neutrals.

That the vessels alluded to will, under the circumstances stated, be treated as neutrals; that no licenses will be required for them; that they will incur no risk of capture, unless they attempt to break blockade, to carry contraband of war, the enemy's despatches, or are guilty of some similar misconduct.

My Lord,

Vessel under Hanoverian colours seized by Customs suspected of being Russian.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Treasury, inclosing a Report from the Commissioners of Customs respecting the detention by their officers of the vessel "Johanna Amelia," as being a Russian vessel under Hanoverian colours; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have to report—

She must prove she has ceased to be Russian.

That this ship appears to have sailed from Lisbon on the 5th April. Her master's account and other evidence show that she was, for some time at least, whilst at Lisbon, a Russian ship, and she now either has not or will not produce any papers, and will not give any evidence to prove when or under what circumstances she ceased to be a Russian and became a Hanoverian vessel. If she be Russian property, she is not protected by the Order in Council of March 29, having sailed from Lisbon subsequently to the date of that Order.

In the absence, therefore, of any proof to rebut the presumption of her still being a Russian ship, that presumption, on the contrary, being confirmed by the silence of her master and other circumstances, I am of opinion that the ship may legally be detained and proceeded against as prize. It is of course possible that she may be released on proving that she is not Russian.

My Lord,

Russian vessel from Havana to Cork with British cargo.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th instant, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 23rd ultimo,* he was directed to transmit to me therewith a further letter from Messrs. Kirkland and Co. respecting the case of the ship "Argo;" and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my further opinion upon this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Kirkiand and Co. may be informed that, although in their letter to your Lordship, dated the 13th March, they state that the "Argo" must now be at sea on her homeward voyage," yet it appears by Messrs. Fesser and Co.'s letter to them of the 6th April that she actually did not sail until the 2nd April.

Under these circumstances I conceive that they are not strictly entitled to avail themselves of your Lordship's letter to them of the 25th March, inasmuch as if their statement of her being then at sea had been correct, she would have been protected by the Order in Council of the 29th March without any further or special instructions being requisite, and if any special instructions were issued, this was done under a misapprehension of the real facts. She may have been, or may be captured at sea, inasmuch as she is not protected by the Order in Council (29th March), and your Lordship's special instructions (which I have not seen) may not have gone beyond the terms of that Order. For this, however, Messrs. Kirkland and Co. are entirely responsible; should she arrive at Cork she will be a lawful prize, and it only remains to decide what might be done with her as such.

The most convenient course would appear to me to be that the Officers of Customs at Cork should take possession of her as a prize, securing her papers, crew and stores; she may then be sent on to Glasgow, and the ordinary proceedings against her may be taken in the Prize Court.

* Query 23rd March. See No. 45.

Ship lawful prize. Release cargo according to promise.

I do not, however, feel able to advise with any great confidence how or by what Department these details can be best carried out, and I can only say generally that I am of opinion the ship will be a lawful prize whenever she arrives in any British port, and her crew will be prisoners of war, but that her cargo ought to be released agreeably to the promise already made in that respect to Messrs. Kirkland and Co., and that under the circumstances it should be discharged at Glasgow.

I am not aware that your Lordship has any legal authority whatsoever in this matter, but the case may be referred either to the Committee of the Privy Council on Licenses or to the Customs, with an intimation of your Lordship's desire that your engagement to Messrs. Kirkland should be carried out.

I may observe, in conclusion, that the further papers which Messrs. Kirkland have transmitted being satisfactory as to bonâ fides of the transaction, and your Lordship will not probably desire to expose Messrs. Kirkland to any unnecessary inconvenience.

My Lord,

Temporary residence in England of a Russian in service of a British subject.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Mosley, requesting to be informed whether a Russian subject, in the service of a British subject, will be allowed to reside in England during the temporary presence of his employer in this country; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, with reference to the prohibition to British subjects to cross the Russian frontier, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Mosley.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it does not appear to me that Mr. Thomas Mosley is entitled to receive from your Lordship an answer to the question which he proposes.

He neither gives the name or country of his correspondent in Portugal, nor does he state the purpose for which he is coming to England, nor the capacity in which the Russian subject in question is employed by such correspondent. Subject to these remarks, I am not aware of any reason why a Russian subject (whose name and profession is quite uncertain) should be prevented from coming to England, or even how he could be prevented from so doing under such circumstances. With reference to "the prohibition to British subjects to cross the Russian frontier," to which your Lordship alludes, I beg to state that I have never seen any document of that purport, and I am not precisely aware of what is meant or alluded to thereby.

My Lord,

Trade with Russia through neutrals.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from Mr. Francis Russell respecting certain points connected with trade with Russia through neutrals, on which he desires information, and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. F. Russell.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am not aware what right Mr. Russell has to ask your Lordship the question which he states the Board of Trade and the Attorney-General decline to answer, and I have frequently adverted to the serious public inconvenience of answering general and abstract legal questions, when no facts or details are stated to show what is the real position or interest of the applicant in connection therewith. If, however, your Lordship should be of opinion that the abstract questions proposed by Mr. Russell should be answered as he puts it, I beg to request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General. I would, however, most respectfully venture to suggest that those British subjects who deliberately propose for their private gain to "adhere to the Queen's enemies," and to devote their capital and their exertions to the augmentation of the enemy's resources, and the furnishing him with supplies during the war, are not entitled to receive the advice and assistance of the Law Officers of the Crown to assist them in so doing, and that they may fairly be left to act at their peril, or at least to obtain other advice.

As to British subjects augmenting enemy's resources.

If the Law Officers should be of opinion that such a line of conduct as suggested is not illegal, and if their opinion or your Lordship's to that effect should be communicated to Mr. Russell and published, I cannot but fear that the result would be anything but favourable to the public interest.

Advising that no answer be returned.

I am, perhaps, overstepping the strict line of my duty in making these remarks, but I feel so strongly that what Mr. Russell wants to know is, in effect, how far he or his friends can go in advancing their private interest by adhering to the Queen's enemies, that I trust your Lordship will excuse my suggesting that he has no right to ask your Lordship or the Law Officers of the Crown to answer such a question, and that he may with propriety be so informed.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this further letter from the Treasury into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That bearing in mind the very suspicious circumstances connected with this ship, which are adverted to in the former papers (returned by me), and in my report of the 9th instant,* I do not consider that the communication from the Hanoverian Consul is sufficient of itself to authorize her release and the abandoning of all further proceedings. When these papers alluded to by the Consul have been inspected, and any further explanations which he may have to offer with respect to her has been given, it may be proper to reconsider the question; at present I can only say that I see no sufficient reason for releasing the "Johanne Emilie."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 9th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch, which your Lordship has received from Mr. Annesley, Her Majesty's Consul at Amsterdam, reporting that applications have of late been made to him by Amsterdam merchants to certify that Russian produce purchased by them at Riga previous to the declaration of war has thereby become neutral property.

that I would take Mr. Annesley's despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon the course which it would be proper to instruct Mr. Annesley to pursue under the circumstances reported in his despatch.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Irregular.

That in my opinion Mr. Annesley should be instructed not to sign or issue any such certificates or declarations as those alluded to; no British interest appears to be in question, and it would be highly irregular for a British Consul in Holland to certify as to what may (or may not) have happened between foreigners in Russia, of which he can have no personal knowledge whatsoever.

I beg leave to refer to my report of the 21st April,* upon a similar question put by Mr. Pringle, Her Majesty's Consul at Stockholm, and to suggest the propriety of instructing British Consuls not to lend their assistance to any transactions of this kind, in which no British property or British subjects are interested. Foreigners in such cases are evidently only anxious to obtain the assistance of British Consular officers, when, if the transaction be regular, it will not be required (inasmuch as their ships and goods will incur no risk against which it will avail them), or when, if it is irregular, and may consequently expose their vessels or goods to capture, such assistance ought to be studiously withheld, as being calculated to embarrass both the captors and Her Majesty's Government and to cover and protect illegal and irregular transactions.

The existence of a naval war, in which Her Majesty has naval allies, appears to me to render it more necessary than ever for British Consuls to confine themselves strictly to the discharge of their duty to British subjects and property exclusively. It is impossible to foresee the serious consequences which may result from their issuing any official documents at all to foreigners.

Relation of Ionian Islands towards Great Britain with reference to war with Russia.

Doctors' Commons, May 19, 1854.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us therewith a collection of papers upon a question which has been raised at Constantinople, and also by parties in this country, and moreover reported upon by the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, touching the relation in which the Ionian States, their citizens, and commerce, stand towards Great Britain, the protecting Power, which is now engaged in hostility with Russia, and the position in which those States are placed with reference to that state of things.

That it being very desirable that instructions on the points raised in these papers should be forwarded with as little delay as possible to Constantinople, your Lordship requests that we would take the subject into consideration without delay, and report our opinion thereupon at our earliest convenience.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

They cannot assume position of neutrals.

That the relations established and now subsisting by the Treaty of Paris and the Ionian Constitution between the Queen of this country and the Ionian States, render it impossible that the Ionian Republic can stand in the position of a neutral as between the belligerent Powers; much less can it be permitted to continue the ordinary relations of amity and commerce with Russia; and we are therefore of opinion that the clearances which have been applied for were properly refused.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th instant, transmitting to me a letter from Messrs. Row and Son, requesting information with respect to the purchase of Russian goods in a neutral port to be brought to England in a neutral vessel. Mr. Hammond requests that I will take this letter into consideration, and favour your Lordship with my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Row. I have accordingly taken their letter into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Row put their question in an abstract form, and do not state that they are in any way interested in the goods to which they allude; such questions ought not, in my humble opinion, as a general rule, to receive any answer.

Transaction legal.

Subject to this remark, I am of opinion that the purchase of Russian goods in a neutral port, and their shipment to a British port in a neutral vessel chartered for that purpose by a British merchant, will, under Her Majesty's Order in Council of April 15th, be treated by the Court of Admiralty as a legal transaction, and will not expose the ship or goods to condemnation.

In humble obedience to your Lordship's command we have taken the papers transmitted to us into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

In humble obedience to your Lordship's commands we have considered the note so transmitted, and have the honour to report—

Conditions for coming through blockade.

That the application of the Belgian Minister is founded on the supposition that a general blockade of the Russian ports will be established on the 15th of May. We are not aware of any such blockade having been established. In the absence of any blockade, no permission will be necessary for these vessels (which will be safe under the Orders in Council). If there should be a blockade, they will only be permitted to bring away such cargoes as may have been actually laden on board before it was established.

Whether Her Majesty's Government will think it right under the circumstances to issue licenses to these vessels and their cargoes is a matter of general policy, upon which it is not within our province to advise.

IN obedience to your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd instant, in which he stated he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, communicating certain information which he has received from the French Minister, with respect to the fictitious sales of Russian merchant vessels to Lubeck citizens, and requesting that in taking these despatches into consideration, we will report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon.

In humble obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report that we have examined the papers that accompanied Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd of May.

Transfer of Russian vessels to Lubeck flag at Lubeck.

With respect to Russian vessels transferred to Lubeck citizens whilst lying in the Port of Lubeck, and which have since sailed under the Lubeck flag, if they appear to be duly documented and the certificates of ownership are in conformity with the law of Lubeck, three-fourths of the crew being citizens of one of the Hanseatic towns or of some state included in the Germanic Confederation, we think that they cannot be safely detained if fallen-in with by our cruizers, unless there is some more definite proof of the transfer to the Lubeck citizen being fictitious than is afforded by the papers before us.

Ditto while in ports of other countries.

With respect to Russian vessels which have been attempted to be transferred to Lubeck citizens whilst they were lying in the ports of other countries, and which have left those ports under the Lubeck flag, Lubeck papers having been transmitted to them from Lubeck, we are of opinion that such ships will not be duly documented, and cannot claim a Lubeck nationality.

In the case of Russian ships transferred whilst in a foreign port to a Lubeck citizen, and leaving such port under the Lubeck flag with Lubeck papers obtained from the Lubeck Consul at such foreign port, we think that so much suspicion justly attaches to the transaction that such ships may be detained until satisfactory proof be given of the bonâ fides of the alleged transfer.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received May 25.)

Doctors' Commons, May 25, 1854.

My Lord,

Relative effect of a notified or de facto blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 21st instant, requesting that, at my earliest convenience, I would report to your Lordship as to the relative effect of a notified or de facto blockade, and whether it is necessary that a formal notification of blockade should be given to foreign Governments or published in the "London Gazette," in order to give effect to a blockade of an enemy's port established de facto by a force adequate to realize it.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That the effect of a notified blockade differs from that of a mere de facto blockade (not notified) chiefly in the species of notice required in order to condemn neutral ships and cargoes who may be captured in the attempt to break the blockade.

Notified blockades require no individual notice to shipmasters.

Notification to a neutral Government binds and affects all those within its dominions, and ignorance or misinformation would not avail them as a defence after such notification. In such cases it is not necessary for the captor to prove that the master was personally cognizant of the fact that the particular port was blockaded; the mere act of sailing after notification with the design to enter a blockaded port will be sufficient to ensure the condemnation of the offending vessel.

In un-notified blockades, warning must be given to each individual master.

On the other hand, in case of a mere de facto blockade (not notified), the individual neutral master must be proved in each case to have personally had actual notice of its existence, as (for instance) by warning from a blockading ship, and to have persisted in the attempt to enter after such notice, before his ship can be condemned. The important results of these principles upon the practical efficacy of a blockade and its operations, so far as relates to stopping all communication and intercourse with the enemy, especially in the case of many ports having a commercial connection with remote regions, or where a great extent of coast is blockaded, will be at once apparent to your Lordship, and it will be obvious that the public notification of a blockade greatly and immediately tends to increase its efficacy, by, as it were, instantly paralyzing all communication between every country which receives such notification and the blockaded ports.

Advantages of notifications and of their publication.

And, inasmuch as this has been the great object of all blockades, every Power establishing a blockade has considered that the giving the utmost publicity to their existence was no less in accordance with its own immediate and direct interest than with its duty to the subjects of neutral Powers.

Such notifications have accordingly been constantly resorted to in all cases, even in civil wars (as in South America), and when the ports blockaded have been in the territories of uncivilized Chiefs or barbarians (as in Africa).

The publication in the "Gazette" of notifications of blockade, whether imposed by Her Majesty or by foreign Powers, has been, I believe, the invariable usage in modern times. I am not aware whether any other or different notification has been also usual.

De facto blockades are valid without notification.

I am, however, of opinion that a blockade de facto, supported by an adequate force, would be legally valid, even although no formal notification of it were given to foreign Governments by the blockading Power.

Neutral Governments would probably inquire officially of that Power whether the blockade was really established by its forces, and the official answer to any such inquiry would operate as a notification.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 5th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, reporting the substance of a conversation which he has had with the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs, relative to the course to be pursued by the Danish Government towards a Russian vessel which is reported to have been taken by a British cruizer, and to have been subsequently recovered by the master from the prize crew, and carried into Ystadt; and to request that we would take this despatch into our consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the reply which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Her Majesty's Government may require that she be made to leave Ystadt.

That we are of opinion that the rescue by the Russian crew amounts to a recapture of the vessel (then being a British vessel) by a Russian force, and that such vessel, when brought into a Swedish port, is to be legally regarded as a British vessel captured by Russians, and consequently that Her Majesty's Government will be warranted by the Swedish Declaration of Neutrality in requiring the Swedish authorities to insist upon her immediately leaving the harbour of Ystadt.

Tea shipped at Shanghai for Russian-American Company at St. Petersburgh.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Messrs. Pelly and Co., agents for the Russian-American Company at St. Petersburgh, respecting certain teas shipped at Shanghai in March last for St. Petersburgh, in which they state that they have a pecuniary interest; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Pelly.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Their British agents have an interest in cargo.

They may bring claim before Prize Court.

That your Lordship has no power to give any such order as requested, nor is it at all required. If the "Cesarewitch" should be captured by any of Her Majesty's vessels and brought into a British Prize Court for adjudication, Messrs. Pelly and Co. will have an opportunity of making any legal claim which they may be advised to make with respect to any portion of the cargo, or of applying to the Crown for a release before condemnation of any portion thereof; but I observe—

1. That Messrs. Pelly acted in this matter, not on their own account, but as the agents of a Russian Company.

2. That although war was imminent on the 6th of February, they paid a draft for 6,506*l*. on account of this transaction on the 15th of May, and that they only made their first application to Her Majesty's Government on the subject two days later, viz., on the 17th. I certainly do not think that, under these circumstances, their case deserves any particular favour.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 25th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a despatch from Lord Bloomfield, inclosing an extract of a letter from the British Vice- Consul at Memel, dated 13th May, announcing that Captain A. Cooper Key (of Her Majesty's steam frigate "Amphion") has given him written information that after the 15th of this month the blockade of the Russian ports will be effectually carried out by the vessels of war under his command; and also a letter from the Admiralty stating that Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier has not yet forwarded specifications of the various ports in the Baltic which he is about to blockade, but that in the case of Riga there is a notice, and by the last accounts that port was effectually blockaded; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion whether the statements contained in them will warrant Her Majesty's Government in giving public notice of the blockade, and if so, if I would furnish your Lordship with a draft of notice to be inserted in the "Gazette" of to-morrow. In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Blockades to be notified.

That, before I can deal with this question in a satisfactory manner, or prepare any draft notice for insertion in the "Gazette," I must request to be furnished with "the notice with respect to Riga," alluded to as being in existence in the letter from the Admiralty to Lord Wodehouse of the 25th, signed by Mr. Dyer, "pro Secretary."

Further information necessary.

I must also request to be furnished with a copy of any official communication from Captain Key, or any other naval officer (to whomsoever addressed), relating to the blockade either of Riga or any other port.

"The Russian ports" is obviously so vague and indefinite a phrase as to be unintelligible.

I must further request to be informed whether any and what arrangement with the French Government exists either as to this or any other blockade being notified and treated as a joint blockade established by the combined naval forces of both countries; and whether any and what definite period is to be allowed for the egress of ships from the ports blockaded, inasmuch as I am aware that the expediency of making such an arrangement has been recently under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; and in conjunction with the Admiralty Advocate, on the 29th April, I gave a written opinion on these subjects upon a case laid before us by the Solicitor to the Admiralty.

Arrangement with French Government.

Days of grace.

And in reference to this point I would respectfully invite attention to a notification with respect to a joint blockade of ports in South America, prepared by Sir John Dodson, and contained in his report of October 31, 1845.

I would also beg leave to refer to my report of the 26th instant,* on the subject of blockades notified, and blockades de facto, and to the communication from Mr. Buchanan, dated 19th May, just received by me, and to state my strong impres- sion of the inexpediency of withholding or delaying formal notification of any blockade actually established, and of the serious inconvenience which may result from the further continuance of the existing uncertainty as to what (if any) Russian ports are actually blockaded.

Formal notifications should not be delayed.

the case of two Dutch vessels which were chartered to proceed to Riga in ballast for the purpose of bringing away corn from that port, which vessels, it is asserted, were boarded on the 1st of this month by a British cruizer, and the master warned against proceeding to their port of destination, although it is alleged that no official intimation of blockade had been published at that period, and that other Dutch vessels in company at the same time were not prevented from continuing their voyage, and did arrive several days later at Riga. Sir James Turing states that the parties who chartered the Dutch vessels above alluded to are merchants of great respectability, and that they have represented to him that they will suffer great loss unless Her Majesty's Government will be pleased to make an exception in their favour by granting them permission to dispatch two vessels to load and bring away from Riga, notwithstanding the blockade, the corn which they have been deprived of under the circumstances above mentioned; and Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take this case into consi- deration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which Sir James Turing should be directed to return to the parties who have addressed to him in this matter.

Dutch vessels going in ballast to Riga for corn, and warned by Brtiish cruizer not to proceed.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into considera- tion, and have the honour to report—

That Sir James Turing should be informed that the request of the merchants to whom he alludes cannot be complied with.

Cannot be allowed to enter.

There appears good reason to suppose that Riga has been effectively blockaded, —at all events, since the 15th ultimo, and possibly from an earlier date. Had these ships, therefore, gone into that port they would, at all events, have run great risk of having either to come out again in ballast, or of being captured if laden; and the warning (whatever it was) has probably turned out advantageous to their owners and charterers.

Neither the place nor the circumstances under which the alleged warning was given to the vessels in question is mentioned, nor (although the ships' papers are said to have been endorsed) is the purport of such endorsement given, nor is it even stated that any warning was given that Riga was actually blockaded on the 1st of May.

Information indefinite.

I do not clearly understand from Sir James Turing's letter whether the parties interested applied to him officially on this subject. If they did not, I do not see why he addressed your Lordship on their behalf; if they did so apply, it would, in my opinion, be proper to instruct him, and all other British Consular Officers, not to interfere in such matters, but to inform all those who may apply to them that they should address themselves either to their own Government, in order to obtain its sanction to their application (which would thereupon be made through the Legation at this Court), or to your Lordship directly, with all necessary particulars. The parties interested in this case are described only as "merchants of great respectability," who had chartered at a date (not stated) Dutch vessels to proceed in ballast to Riga, and no names or other particulars are given. I do not feel any confidence that Russian interests may not be at the bottom of the whole affair. At all events, I would venture to suggest that Her Majesty's Consuls should be instructed not to apply to your Lord- ship in such cases without stating the necessary dates and facts, inasmuch as they must be well aware that such very vague and indefinite statements as the present cannot be dealt with in a satisfactory manner, and can only cause useless trouble and delay.

Consuls should not take up such cases.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from Mr. Buchanan, the United States' Minister at this Court, applying for permission for American vessels to go to Russian ports in order to convey from those ports merchan- dize purchased before the war; and to request that I would take Mr. Buchanan's note into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon with the least possible delay.

Application for American ships to enter blockaded ports.

C

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken Mr. Buchanan's note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Arrangement as to days of grace.

That it is possible some arrangement may have been entered into with France on the subject of blockade, especially as to the allowance of a fixed time for the egress of neutral ships with cargoes. On this subject I would beg leave to refer to an opinion given by me, in conjunction with the Admiralty Advocate, on the 28th April last,* on a case submitted to us by the Solicitor to the Admiralty.

It is obvious that a joint action on the part of the Allies on all points relating to blockade will be highly expedient. In the absence of any such arrangement, I observe, with reference to Mr. Buchanan's communication to your Lordship—†

Great Britain maintains her belligerent rights.

1. That Her Majesty's Declaration of the 28th March last expressly declared her Royal intention to "maintain her belligerent rights to prevent neutrals from breaking any effective blockade established with an adequate force against the enemy's forts, harbours, or coasts;" it is, therefore, not very easy to perceive upon what grounds Mr. Buchanan could be thereby "encouraged to believe" that any such blockade would be conducted in a manner altogether different from that in which all blockades have hitherto been conducted.

British and United States law of blockade is identical.

2. That the law of blockade as affecting neutrals is in all its leading principles substantially identical in the United States and Great Britain. "The judicial decisions in England and in this country," says Chancellor Kent (Commentaries, p. 149), "have given great precision to the law of blockade by the application of it to particular cases. They are distinguished for general coincidence and harmony in their principles." It is important to bear this in mind in considering Mr. Buchanan's application.

Application at variance with law and usage.

3. That the concessions for which Mr. Buchanan asks are wholly at variance with the existing law and use of nations as to blockade and to the legal decisions of the highest authorities in the United States and in Great Britain; and Mr. Buchanan in effect admits this throughout, for he does not cite any precedent or authority whatever in favour of his requests in any one instance, nor does he even offer similar concessions in the case of any blockade which may be hereafter established by the United States.

Concessions made by Her Majesty.

4. The course of trade with Russia to which Mr. Buchanan adverts is by no means peculiar to the United States; it is common to many other nations, especially Great Britain and the Hanse Towns, whose subjects have made large advances upon and payments for, Russian produce, by which they may be great losers in consequence of the war. I would beg to refer to my report of the 20th March‡ on the subject of the application made by the Agent of the Hanse Towns on this point, and also to my report of the 6th of April§ on an application from Her Majesty's Consul at St. Petersburgh; and I am not aware that Her Majesty's Government has yet issued any licenses even to its own subjects, who may be placed in their position. Considerations of the description of those suggested by Mr. Buchanan, and a regard for general commercial interests, weighed materially with Her Majesty's Government in inducing it to make the great concessions which it has done in the Declarations of 28th March and the subsequent Orders in Council; and Her Majesty's Government may well be surprized and disappointed in finding that such ample concessions only lead to further and unreasonable demands.

Blockades admit of no exceptions.

5. It is impossible to make exceptions in blockade in favour of one neutral Power exclusively, and all relaxation is very inconvenient and hazardous, and tends to expose the validity of the entire blockade to question in the Prize Court. "For what is a blockade but a universal exclusion of all vessels not privileged by law? If some are to be permitted to pass, others will have a right to infer that the blockade is raised." Lord Stowell, "Rolla," 6 C. Robinson, 372.

Cargo loaded before blockade may be released.

6. In the case of American or other neutral vessels who may be captured coming out of a blockaded port, such portion of their cargoes as may have been actually laden on board when the blockade was established will, on due proof, be restored.

Not cargo purchased before it.

Authorities as to blockade-breaking, &c.

7. With respect to the case of cargoes which, though purchased before blockade, may not have been laden on board until afterwards, Mr. Buchanan does not pretend to cite any authority or precedent for their being released. I dissent entirely from his assertion that "the same reason will apply to both these cases." "With respect to violating a blockade by coming out with a cargo, the time of shipment is very material, for although it might be hard to refuse a neutral liberty to retire with a cargo already laden, and by that act already become neutral property; yet, after the commencement of a blockade a neutral cannot be allowed to interpose in any way to assist the exportation of the property of the enemy." "A neutral ship departing can only take away a cargo bonâ fide purchased and delivered before the commencement of the blockade; if she afterwards takes on board a cargo, it is a violation of the blockade."*

"After the commencement of a blockade a neutral is no longer at liberty to make any purchase in that port."†

Objects of blockade.

"The object of a blockade is not merely to prevent the importation of supplies, but to prevent export as well as import, and to cut off all communication of commerce with the blockaded port. The act of egress is as culpable as the act of ingress, if it be done fraudulently; and a ship coming out of a blockaded port is, in the first instance, liable to seizure, and, to obtain a release, the party must give satisfactory proof of the innocence of his intention. But according to modern usage, a blockade does not rightfully extend to a neutral vessel found in port when the blockade was instituted, nor prevent her coming out with the cargo bonâ fide purchased and laden on board before the commencement of the blockade."‡

Knowledge of blockade.

Relaxation to vessels from a distance.

Notice to vessels from a distance.

8. With respect to permitting American vessels to break blockade by entering (after warning) merely because they did not know of the blockade when they sailed, the same observations apply. I consider this demand preposterous; on what possible grounds Mr. Buchanan "conceives this to be a principal of international law" I cannot imagine; all that they will be entitled to in such cases will be actual notice or warning; but even that is not to be sought for off the port blockaded. "Some relaxation was very reasonably given to this rule in its application to distant voyages, as from America; and ships sailing for Europe before knowledge of the blockade reached them were entitled to notice, even at the blockaded port. If they sailed after notice, they might sail on a contingent destination for the blockaded port, with the purpose of calling for information at some European port and be allowed the benefit of such a contingent destination, to be rendered definite by the information. But in no case is the information as to the existence of the blockade to be sought at the mouth of the port."§ "Where the vessel sails from a country lying sufficiently near to the blockaded port to have constant information of the state of the blockade, whether it is continued or relaxed, no special notice is necessary; for the public declaration in this case implies notice to the party after sufficient time has elapsed to receive the declaration at the port whence the vessel sails. But where the country lies at such a distance that the inabitants cannot have this constant information, they may lawfully send their vessels conjecturally, upon the expectation of finding the blockade up, after it has existed for a considerable time. In this case, the party has a right to make a fair inquiry whether the blockade be determined or not, and, consequently, cannot be involved in the penalties affixed to a violation of it unless, upon such inquiry, he receives notice of the existence of the blockade."‖ When once they are proved to have had notice, the fact of their having originally sailed without notice is wholly immaterial.

9. The proposal that the Minister and Consuls of the United States in Russia should exclusively verify the facts regarding the pecuniary interests of their fellow citizens, by investigations made in the enemy's dominions (where Her Majesty's Government could have no representative, and no knowledge of what was going on), "in a manner which (Mr. Buchanan says) could not fail to prove satisfactory to the British Government," scarcely requires a serious answer. It seems wholly to ignore the existence of Prize Courts, legal evidence, ship's papers, the possibility of fraud, and the rights of captors.

Notification of blockades.

10. Mr. Buchanan's request for information with respect to the existence and commencement of any blockade of Russian ports appears to me quite reasonable and proper; nothing being more likely to bring on international difficulties with neutrals, and especially neutrals at a great distance, than any uncertainty about the existence, date, or extent of blockades established de facto, but not promptly and duly notified.

11. His request to be informed of the instructions which have been given to Her Majesty's naval officers with reference to their conduct to neutrals, does not appear to me to be one with which your Lordship can properly comply. I am, of course, not aware whether any or what special instructions have been issued on the subject, the official documents issued by various departments of Her Majesty's Government not being supplied to me except irregularly, notwithstanding my reiterated requests for them. In the absence of any special instructions, I presume that the established usage of nations will be followed by Her Majesty's ships of war in all cases of blockade; at all events they capture at their own risk, and will be responsible to neutrals if they act illegally. All laden vessels coming out of any blockaded port will be captured and sent before the Prize Court for adjudication; such vessels or their cargoes will only be released on proof of their innocence. "A ship coming out of a blockaded port is in the first instance liable to seizure, and, to obtain a release, the party must give satisfactory proof of the innocence of his intention."—"Kent's Commentaries," vol. I, p. 148. All neutral vessels will be allowed egress in ballast. No vessel will be allowed to enter on any pretence. Those who may persist in attempting so to do after actual knowledge of the blockade (howsoever acquired) will be captured and condemned.

Exceptional favours demanded by United States.

In conclusion, I would respectfully venture to observe that Mr. Buchanan evidently requires and pretends to expect the application of totally different and exceptional principles in favour of the United States to those which any nation has hitherto contended for, and to those which the United States themselves have hitherto conceded to others, and to those which Her Majesty has applied to her own subjects; he asks throughout for the concessions of special favours in the tone in which a right is usually demanded; he artfully mixes up requisitions which he must know that he need not have made, because the decisions of the English Prize Courts have established them as legal rights, e. g. egress with cargo laden before blockade, with others which he cannot expect to be granted by any belligerent. I humbly conceive that there must be some ulterior purpose or design in this, and the more so since all these points are most accurately defined in the standard works of American authors on international law, with which Mr. Buchanan must be quite familiar.

I have, &c.

P.S.—I have confined myself, for obvious reasons, to quotations from American authors of the highest authority, but all the best European authorities upon these subjects have been in effect adopted and incorporated into the American law and authorities.

Ship building at Stettin for British subjects.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from MM. Weinholt, Wehner, and Co., requesting to be informed whether they may, as British merchants, contract for the building of a ship at Stettin, or some other German port, and to request that we would take this letter into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the reply to be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No objection while at peace with Germany.

That we are at a loss to understand what can have given rise to the doubt entertained by MM. Weinholt, Wehner, and Co. We cannot conceive in what way it can be supposed that the liberty of a British merchant to have a ship built in the port of a friendly State can be affected by the circumstance of this country being at war with some other Power. If, indeed, the question of MM. Weinholt and Co. has reference to the possibility of war taking place between this country and the neutral Power in whose port the ship may be built, that, of course, is a contingency the happening of which would entirely alter the case, and of which the parties ordering the ship to be built in a foreign country must take the chance. All that can be said is that, under existing circumstances, they will run no risk so far as the acts of this country are concerned.

British vessel sunk by Russian batteries in the Danube.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from Mr. Ellice, inclosing various papers communicated to him by Messrs. Andersen, owners of the British vessel "Bedlington," which vessel is said to have been sunk by the Russian batteries in the Danube; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make upon the case.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's note of 24th ultimo transmitting some further papers upon the above case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

War renders present steps impossible.

That the existing war with Russia renders it impracticable for Her Majesty's Government to take any step whatever in this case at the present time.

With the view, however, of the possibility of obtaining some compensation for the claimants hereafter, it may be desirable to have some information of the most important facts bearing on the claim, which information is not supplied by the papers sent herewith.

The newspaper extract apparently refers to some hostile acts of the Russians committed upon other British vessels (the "Ann" and the "Crescent" steamers) near the same place, on the 18th of March, for which the Russian General apologized, and which he stated to have been committed by mistake. He is stated to have been thereupon informed that the "Bedlington" was coming down the river, and to have thereupon pledged his word that she should not be molested; she was nevertheless fired upon and sunk. Under these circumstances it certainly would appear that she was sunk in a very unjustifiable manner, and with no pretence of right, but under mistake as to her character, or as to the orders given to the gunners.

May be pressed hereafter.

If this should turn out to have been the case, this claim might perhaps be successfully brought forward hereafter; but until full particulars are given, such, for instance, as whether she was at anchor or under sail, whether she had her colours flying, whether it was by night or day, whether she had received any and what prohibition or warning previously, and for what reason, or on what pretext, she was fired at, it is impossible to express any opinion on the case.

The "full account given to the British Consul at Constantinople" (mentioned in Mr. Wright's letter of the 6th of April) is not with the papers.

When this is forthcoming the case may be reconsidered.

Neutral good offices for liberation of crew taken before war.

The fate of the captain and crew is peculiarly hard; I can only suggest that possibly the good offices of some neutral Power may be exerted to procure their liberation as non-combatants taken before the war.

My Lord,

Fraudulent assumption of neutral flag by Russian vessels at Leghorn and Genoa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the French Ambassador at this Court (dated May 22, 1854), inclosing a Report from the French Consul at Leghorn, relative to the fraudulent assumption of neutral flags by Russian vessels at Leghorn and Genoa; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion how far Her Majesty's Government are bound to respect the Tuscan flag on board of vessels hoisting it under the circumstances mentioned by the French Consul.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Liable to capture.

That assuming the French Consul's impression to be correct, the transfers of the ships in question are obviously so colourable and pretended that the ships would not be protected thereby, and would be liable to capture and condemnation; but I observe that the French Consul gives no dates or details, and does not mention whether there was even an apparent compliance with the requirements of the local law relative to the purchase or navigation of foreign ships, or whether any money at all was even pretended to be paid by the purchasers. I cannot, therefore, entirely rely on the strict accuracy of his impression of these transactions. I may, perhaps, state generally—

Prize Courts recognize validity of real sales.

1. That although British Prize Courts recognize the validity of boná fide and complete sales of enemy's ships to neutrals in neutral ports, though made during war, that such sales are always regarded as open to suspicion, and are required to be proved to be not merely in due form but boná fide, and without any reservation or secret agreement or understanding whatsoever.

2. That in every case, especially where neutral ships' papers are exhibited, and the ship is apparently navigated in accordance with the requirements of the law of the neutral State, the captor seizes at his own risk; but he will be justified in so doing, and his costs will be allowed by the Prize Court, if there existed reasonable cause of suspicion against the ship, even although she should be restored by the decision of such Court.

Relaxations do not extend to enemy's ships.

3. That none of the relaxations in favour of enemy's goods and neutral ships contained in the late Declaration and Orders in Council extend to enemy's ships.

4. That all neutral States favouring or assisting such transfers, or even permitting them to take place with great facility, may fairly expect that all ships hoisting their flag and using their papers will be exposed to frequent and rigorous search, and even to detention and capture upon the slightest suspicion, and that they have, therefore, a strong interest in preventing, or at least in checking, such transactions.

That I cannot suggest any further or better answer than that which has already been given to Messrs. Pelly, and that the facts stated in their letter of the 30th of May do not alter my opinion of the case.

Transaction being on Russian account.

The transaction was throughout on Russian account; the claimants state that they advanced their money as agents for their Russian principals, without taking any legal security or obtaining any transfer of the property; such property being therefore Russian is, as such, liable to capture and confiscation, and I do not see that the claimants have a just or equitable claim to be reimbursed out of it to the amount of such advance made on Russian account; they are, in my opinion, not interested in the cargo of the "Cesarewitch" as British merchants, but as Russian agents, and as such I do not consider them entitled to any favour.

If, however, your Lordship should consider this case entitled to further consideration, I must request the assistance of the Law Officers of the Crown.

My Lord,

Blockade of Danube announced by allied Admirals.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter dated the 12th, transmitting to me a telegraphic despatch from Her Majesty's Consul-General at Belgrade, reporting that he had been instructed by Vice-Admiral Dundas to inform Her Majesty's Government that the Admirals commanding the combined squadrons in the Black Sea had declared the Danube to be in a state of blockade.

Mr. Hammond requests that I will take this paper into my consideration with reference to the letter from the Admiralty, which is also inclosed, and that I will report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion whether the facts stated by Mr. Fonblanque will warrant Her Majesty's Government in giving public notice of the blockade, and, if so, that I will furnish your Lordship with a draft of notice to be inserted in the "Gazette" of this day.

I have accordingly taken into consideration the telegraphic despatch from Mr. Fonblanque, with reference to the letter of the Admiralty, and have the honour to report—

Notice for "Gazette.

That the Lords of the Admiralty entertain no doubt of an effective blockade of the Danube having been de facto established by a competent force on the 1st of June, inasmuch as "their Lordships conclude that the necessary orders will be given by your Lordship for the due insertion of the proper notice in to-day's "Gazette."

I have accordingly prepared (and herewith transmit) a draft Notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

Admiral should report in more definite terms.

I trust that I shall be excused for pointing out to your Lordship that the telegraphic message from Vice-Admiral Dundas to your Lordship is not, in my opinion, by any means so clear or definite as is desirable in such cases. It does not state that the Danube was actually blockaded by a competent force on any particular date, but only that on the 1st of June the Vice-Admirals (the combined fleets being then at Varna) had declared the Danube to be in a state of blockade.

Bearing in mind, however, the ample force under their command, trusting to their experience, and having regard to the serious consequences likely to arise from any delay or appearance of doubt or hesitation in notifying such a blockade, I have thought it best to prepare the notification. The expediency of calling the attention of the Admirals to the importance of strict accuracy in such cases, and above all to the necessity of a distinct statement of the date at and from which a blockade de facto is or has been established by a competent force, will I trust receive your Lordship's consideration.

IT is hereby notified that the Right Honourable the Earl of Clarendon, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received a despatch from the Vice-Admiral Dundas, commanding Her Majesty's naval forces in the Black Sea, addressed to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and dated the 1st of June, announcing that the Danube was blockaded by the combined naval forces of Her Majesty and of the Emperor of the French.

Sound Dues. Payment by prizes.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's command signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th ultimo, stating that with reference to our letter of the 24th,* requesting to be furnished with further information with respect to the Sound Dues, he was directed to refer us to Hertslet's Commercial Treaties, vol. 6, p. 280, containing the stipulations entered into between this country and Denmark for the regulation of the duties to be levied on vessels and goods passing the Sound, and to an extract from the regulations which have recently been issued by the Danish Government with respect to the duties to be levied during the war in the Sound and the belts on the vessels of the belligerents, a copy of which Lord Wodehouse is pleased to transmit.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Liable only in respect of cargo.

That we are inclined to think that a Russian merchant vessel captured by an English ship of war, and passing the Sound, would fall within Article 15, section C, of the Agreement between Great Britain and Denmark of August 13, 1841, and be liable only in respect of the cargo aboard, but as we think it desirable to ascertain the rule and practice that prevailed during the late war, when the case must have repeatedly arisen, we respectfully suggest that this should be ascertained in order that there may be consistency in the rule to be observed.

Notification.

Notification for "Gazette."

IT is hereby notified that a communication has been received by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty from Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, commanding Her Majesty's naval forces in the Baltic, dated Hango Bay, May 28, 1854, informing their Lordships that the ports of Libau and Windau, on the coast of Courland, and other ports, roads, havens, or creeks from latitude 55° 53′ north to as far north as Cape Dager Oit, including the ports of Riga, Pernan, and all other ports, roads, havens, or creeks in the Gulf of Riga, were then in a state of blockade by a competent force.

That all ports, roads, havens, or creeks eastward from Cape Dager Oit, including Hapsal, Worms Island, Port Baltic, Revel, and other intermediate ports on the coast of Esthonia as far as Ekholm Light (situated in latitude 59° 43′ north, longitude 25° 48′ east), and from thence in a north-west direction as far as Helsingfors and Sweaborg on the coast of Finland; continuing westward, Baro Sound, Hango Head, Oro, and Abo, including the Aland Archipelago and intermediate ports; from thence north, including Nystad, Bjorneborg, Christinestadt, Vasa, Walgrund Islands, Little Carleby, Jacobstad, Great Carleby, Lahts, Kalaioki, Brakestad, Uleaborg, Karle Island, Ijo, Gestila, Tornea, Red Tornea (situated in latitude about 65° 50′ north, longitude 24° 15′ east), and all intermediate Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks in the Gulf of Bothnia; and all the before-mentioned ports and places are and were then in a state of strict blockade by a competent force.

And it is hereby further notified that all the measures authorized by the laws of nations and the respective Treaties between Her Majesty and the different neutral Powers will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

My Lord,

Baltic blockade. Gulf of Finland not included.

WITH reference to my report of this day's date (accompanying a Draft Notification of blockade of Russian ports in the Baltic), I beg to observe that Sir C. Napier does not expressly state that all the ports of the Gulf of Finland (especially Cronstadt and St. Petersburgh) are blockaded; the accompanying chart does not indicate them as being blockaded; Sir C. Napier also states "another division will extend up to Cronstadt; this will hermetically seal the whole of the Gulf." I conclude, therefore, that the existing blockade will be extended to these ports and to the whole of the Gulf of Finland. When such a blockade shall be actually established by a competent force, a further notification thereof will be proper, and I would venture to request your Lordship to cause the requisite instructions to be addressed to Sir C. Napier, in order to insure the transmission of prompt and exact intelligence by him relative thereto, so as to enable Her Majesty's Government to publish a formal notification both of any such blockade, and of any other blockade or any changes thereof, as they may occur.

Further notification necessary.

My Lord,

Sale of Russian ships to neutrals.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, inclosing a copy of a Circular which has been addressed by the French Government to their Consular Agents abroad, reminding them that the 7th Article of the Regulation of July 25, 1778, relative to the sale of enemy's ships subsequently to the declaration of war, is still in force in France, and instructing French Consular Agents to give information to the English and French cruizers of any sales being effected in contravention of that Article; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take Sir Ralph Abercromby's despatch and its inclosures into consideration, and at our earliest convenience report to your Lordship our opinion as to how far the English law and the recent instructions issued by Her Majesty's Government coincide with the French law in this respect.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch and its inclosures into consideration, and have the honour to report—

French law forbids. English law permits if bonâ fide.

That the English law does not coincide with the French law in this respect, inasmuch as by the English law the purchase of enemy's ships by neutrals is valid and legal, although made during war, provided such purchase be made bonâ fide and without any secret trust or reservation of hostile interest.

We would beg leave to refer to our Report of the 24th ultimo,[*] on the fictitious sales of Russian ships to Lubeck citizens, and to that of April 11[†] on the same subject.

We are not aware of any recent instructions having been issued by Her Majesty on the subject of Russian vessels purchased by neutrals since the declaration of war.

My Lord,

Clearance of the "St. George" for a Russian port.

(Alleged sale of a British vessel to a Dane.)

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a letter from the Treasury respecting an application made by Messrs. Christiansen and Co., of Leith, for the clearance out of the vessel "St. George" from[‡] a Russian port; and to request that I would take the papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Christiansen and Co.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

If not proved to be Danish, must be considered British, and clearance refused.

That this question appears to me to be properly for the decision of the Customs, and not of your Lordship. I can see no particular reasons for deviating from the ordinary rule or practice of the Customs in the case of the "St. George." In every case of the purchase by foreigners of British ships in British ports the Customs must be satisfied that the property in such ships has been legally transferred, and must require the production of the regular documents, and there must, I presume, be certain rules laid down, or a certain practice and usage existing, for their guidance in such cases. Until, therefore, such documents are produced, and such proof is given as would be considered sufficient in any similar case to show that the "St. George" was actually and legally a Danish vessel, she must be considered as a British vessel, and cannot be permitted to clear out for a Russian port. I should conceive that the production, at least, of a bill of sale, and probably also of other documents, would be necessary by the rules or the practice of the Customs to prove her to be Danish property; but I can only say that, whatever documents are required by the Customs in the case of any other British vessel sold to any other foreigner ought to be required in this case, and I would further invite attention to the Danish Royal Ordinance of Christian VII, 4th May, 1803, on this subject (recently printed, and sent to me from the Foreign Office), by which it will be seen what ship's papers are required in Denmark.

If Danish, may only go to unblockaded ports.

The letter of Messrs. Christiansen and the passport of the Danish Consul appears to me to be wholly insufficient to prove that the "St. George" is a Danish vessel; and unless she is proved to be so, she ought not, in my opinion, to be allowed to clear out for a Russian port. If she should be proved to be Danish, she can, of course, only be allowed to clear for a blockaded[*] port.

Mr. Mackenzie, Surgeon to Imperial Dockyard at Archangel.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 31st ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying despatch from Mr. Whitehead, Her Majesty's Consul at Archangel, reporting that he has been requested by Mr. Mackenzie, a British subject, who for the last twenty-five years has been attached as Surgeon to the Imperial Dockyard and other hospitals at Archangel, without, however, becoming a Russian subject, to inquire whether it would be contrary to the allegiance which he owes to his Sovereign for him to continue his service as Surgeon to the Imperial Dockyard, or to any other civil department, now that war is declared between this country and Russia; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which Mr. Whitehead should be directed to return to Mr. Mackenzie's inquiry.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Contrary to allegiance to continue service: but might be sanctioned under circumstances.

That we are of opinion that it would be contrary to the allegiance which, as a British subject, Mr. Mackenzie owes to his Sovereign to continue his services as Surgeon to the Russian Imperial Dockyard. At the same time, considering that the service rendered by Mr. Mackenzie is not in the full sense of the term a military service, as it would be were he serving with the Imperial army or navy; that he has been so many years in the Imperial service; and that to quit it now would probably be seriously detrimental to his interests; it may be for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government whether his continuance in his present service might not be sanctioned.

"Johanna Amelia." Supposed Russian under Hanoverian colours.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 9th of May,* respecting the detention of the "Johanna Amelia," supposed to be a Russian vessel under Hanoverian colours, he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Portuguese Minister at this Court, inclosing an extract of a letter from the consignees of some Portuguese property on board that vessel, and requesting that that property might be given up to the consignees; and a letter from the Council Office, to which Department Count Lavradio's application was referred, together with the answer returned to Count Lavradio's note.

Lord Wodehouse also incloses a further note from Count Lavradio stating the grounds on which he thinks that the Portugese property in question should be restored without delay, conditions, or expense, to the consignees of the parties to whom that property belongs; and he is pleased to request that I would take all the enclosed papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Count Lavradio's note of the 13th instant.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

That I am informed by the Admiralty Proctor that all the cargo laden on board this vessel has been already released and restored to the claimants or their agents.

Portuguese property on board should be released.

If, however, this should not actually have been done, I would suggest that the necessary directions should be forthwith issued to that gentleman to cause the particular goods alluded to by Count Lavradio, and described in the original bills of lading and shipping documents forwarded by his Excellency, to be released and restored to the Portuguese owners or their agents, and that Count Lavradio should be informed to this effect in answer to his Excellency's note of the 13th instant.

Transfer of vessels at Oporto from Russian to Hanoverian flag.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a note which your Lordship addressed to the Hanoverian Minister at this Court requesting to be furnished with certain information with respect to the transfer of vessels at Oporto from the Russian to the Hanoverian flag. Lord Wodehouse likewise incloses Count Kielmansegg's reply explaining the circumstances under which this transfer was effected; and he is pleased to request that we would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the manner in which such vessel should be treated.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Transfer to Russian flag, and re-transfer to Hanoverian.

That we are of opinion that the circumstances attending the alleged transfer of these vessels to Russian subjects in the first instance, and their present retransfer to Hanoverians, are of a very equivocal character, and such as would fully warrant their being captured, and sent before a Prize Court for adjudication, leaving the alleged Hanoverian owners to make out their title to them if they can. If, indeed, Her Majesty's Government should be perfectly satisfied that in fact no property in these ships ever did pass to the Russians, the assumption of the Russian flag being merely colourable, and a deceit practised on the Danes, and that the vessel in effect remained Hanoverian, it might be for the consideration of Government whether the right to treat these vessels as Russian (arising from the assumption ostensibly of Russian nationality) should, under the circumstances, be enforced. At the same time, we cannot but observe that it is of great importance that the utmost good faith should be observed and enforced in all that regards the national character of ships, and that owners should be held bound by a nationality they have assumed, unless a subsequent bonâ fide transfer takes place.

Depends on bonâ fides.

Russian Dutch loan.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th instant, stating that he was directed to call our attention to the accompanying notice of a motion to be made in the House of Commons on Tuesday next, with the view of obtaining the concurrence of that House to a proposition to the following effect: that Great Britain having undertaken, by a Convention concluded with Russia on the 16th May, 1831, to secure the payment to Russia of a portion of her old Dutch debt, in consideration of the general arrangements of the Congress of Vienna to which Russia had given her adhesion; and that Russia having withdrawn her adhesion from those arrangements by neglecting for a series of years to keep the channel of the Danube clear for the purposes of navigation, which she was bound to do under the general stipulations of the Congress of Vienna relating to rivers, Great Britain is freed from the obligations in respect to the Russian Dutch Loan which she contracted by the Convention of 1831.

As to future payments by England.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that we would take this proposition into our immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon, at the latest by Tuesday morning.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the proposition into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we think it necessary to refer to some documents of an earlier date than those to which our attention has been directed.

Treaties.

Conditions of original obligation to pay.

By the Ist Article of the Convention between Great Britain and the Netherlands, signed on the 14th May, 1814, Great Britain engaged to restore to the Sovereign of the Netherlands the Colonies possessed by Holland at the commencement of the war, with the exception of the Cape of Good Hope, Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice, which were to be disposed of by a Supplementary Convention; and by the 3rd section of the Ist Article of that Supplementary Convention, it was provided that Great Britain should bear equally with Holland such further charges (not exceeding 3,000,000*l.*) as might be agreed on towards the final and satisfactory settlement of the Low Countries, in union with Holland, and under the dominion of the House of Orange.

Value received by Great Britain.

Great Britain, therefore, received the valuable consideration of four Colonies as the price of her engagement to be liable to contribute 3,000,000*l.* for the purposes of Holland, and Holland had the right to direct the manner in which this engagement should be fulfilled; provided only that it should be directed to the establishment of the final union of Holland and the Netherlands.

By the Treaty of Chaumont, concluded on the 1st March, 1814, Holland and the Low Countries became liable to repay to the allied Powers, parties to that Treaty, a portion of the expenses attending their reconquest from France; and those claims were waived by the allied Powers in favour of Russia, and Russia having become a party to the final union of Holland and the Netherlands, the King of Holland had a right to call upon Great Britain to fulfil in favour of Russia the engagement contained in the Supplementary Convention which is above referred to.

It is therefore clear that Great Britain became a party to the Convention of May 1815, by virtue of a contract for a valuable consideration between herself and Holland; and that so long as Holland is liable to Russia, that is, so long as the Russo-Dutch Loan remains unpaid, Holland is entitled to the benefit of that contract.

It is a mistake to treat Russia's right to the guarantee given by Great Britain as dependent on the condition of her abiding by the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna. Russia fully performed her engagement by being a party to the final union of Holland and the Netherlands,—a union which she offered to maintain by force of arms in 1830, though she desisted from doing so principally at the request of Great Britain.

It is in this sense only that the language in the recital of the Convention of November 1831 ought to be understood when it speaks of the "general arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna;" for no other part of these arrangements entered into this contract than that which provided for the final union of Holland and the Netherlands.

Convention of 1815 not to be affected by war.

It is important to observe that the obligation of the Convention of 19th May, 1815, was not to be affected by war,—a provision which is affirmed by the Act of 55 George III, c. 115, and that this Convention was prior to the Act of the Congress of Vienna as to the navigation of rivers, which Act was not signed until the 9th June, 1815.

The right of Russia to the payment stipulated to be made by Great Britain in the Convention of 1815 was expressly acknowledged and confirmed by this country in the Convention of November 1831; for which confirmation Russia, by the IInd Article, gave a new and distinct engagement by way of consideration, and this Convention became an additional and independent contract.

We are therefore of opinion that there is no foundation in law or in fact for the Resolutions of Lord D. Stuart, and that there is no just ground on which Great Britain can hold herself released from the engagements in the Conventions of 1815 and 1831.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd instant, stating that he was directed to state to us that the Government of Russia has just entered into a contract in a foreign city for a loan of a considerable sum of money, and that your Lordship would wish to be informed by us whether any subject of Her Majesty can legally contribute to that loan by purchasing either in this or any other country shares in the same, or holding either for himself or in behalf of other persons any such shares; and, if he cannot do so legally, what is the nature of the crime, or the degree of penalty which any subject of Her Majesty would render himself liable to by any dealings with this loan.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

My Lord,

Maritime law. British and French points of disagreement.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith the accompanying papers respecting questions of maritime law on which the views of the Governments of England and France have not yet been brought to coincide. Mr. Hammond states that the Memorandum on the Netherland and Danish Instruction, which forms the first of the series, is founded on reports made by myself, in common with other Legal Advisers of the Board of Admiralty. That this Memorandum was placed in the hands of the Government of France, who, a short time ago, delivered to Lord Cowley, in reply to a further communication which he was directed to make to the French Minister, a memorandum of observations which were afterwards more formally stated in the despatch from M. Drouyn de L'huys to the French Ambassador at this Court, also inclosed.

Contraband of war. Blockade. Right of search.

That these papers having been sent to the Board of Admiralty, that Department has declared in the accompanying letter its adherence to the opinions formerly expressed by it in regard to the three specific points of contraband of war, blockade, and right of search, still under discussion between the Governments of England and France.

That your Lordship requests that I would take the papers now transmitted into consideration, and report to your Lordship such observations as may occur to me upon the statements and arguments therein set forth.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I entirely concur in the view which is taken in the letter from the Secretary to the Admiralty to Mr. Hammond, dated June 20, and I also adhere to the opinions which I have already given, in common with the other Counsel on behalf of the Admiralty, and as expressed in the "Memorandum on the Netherlands and Danish Instructions," founded upon my previous reports.

Notification of blockade dispenses with individual warnings.

I may add that, on the points in question, I have more than once reported, or, in conjunction with other Counsel, given written opinions to the Admiralty, to which reports and opinions generally I would beg to refer. I would further beg leave to state that, in many of my recent reports addressed to your Lordship, I have given my opinion upon some of the points in question, especially as to the effect of notification of blockade in dispensing with the necessity of notice or warning to each particular vessel (May 25).* See also my report dated May 1†, on Mr. Coulquhoun's application on behalf of the Hans Towns, and that dated May 3,‡ on certain American doctrines, and more particularly to that dated May 29,§ upon an application from Mr. Buchanan (United States' Minister). Subject to the opinions which I have so frequently expressed on these points, and to which I still adhere, I would venture to observe generally, with reference to M. Drouyn's despatch to Count Walewski:—

Separate warnings unadvisable.

A (1). (As to Notice of Blockade.) I consider that the requiring actual warning and endorsement of the ship's papers in each case would tend most seriously to diminish, and in some cases to neutralize, the effect of blockade, more especially in the event of the accidents of weather, or of war, preventing a particular blockade being so closely and invariably maintained as to render any attempts to enter altogether hopeless; and I cannot recommend any relaxation or any deviation whatever from the law and practice of British and United States' Prize Courts on this point.

Egress of neutrals through blockade.

B. The permission of egress to neutrals for a certain fixed period after the institution of a blockade is rather a question of policy than of law. The allowance of egress for such a period will be legal, and has been occasionally resorted to in blockades by allied French and English forces. (See report of Sir John Dodson, and notification of blockade of the port of Buceo, October 31, 1845.)

On this head, any arrangement to which your Lordship may consider it expedient to accede may, in my opinion, be safely made with the French Government, and instructions in accordance therewith issued to Her Majesty's naval officers.

A (2) and B (2). (As to search). Do not require any remark.

Right of search, notwithstanding convoy.

C. (Right of search notwithstanding convoy.) I cannot advise any concession whatsoever on this point, which has always been resolutely maintained by Her Majesty's Government (see the "Maria," 1, C. Robinson, p. 340; the "Elsabe," 4, C. Robinson,

Should not be relinquished.

173), and which is, in my opinion, of the greatest practical importance, especially having regard to the establishing of a rule, or a precedent for future wars.

I presume that Her Majesty's naval officers will be instructed not to search neutrals under convoy, excepting where there exists some reasonable ground of suspicion.

Contraband of war.

3. Contraband of war.

This, again, is a question of policy rather than of law.

Articles vary.

As to coals and sulphur.

The list of particular articles to be so considered, when not enumerated in any existing Treaty, must vary from time to time with circumstances. The inconvenience of any permanent and unalterable list will be at once apparent. The recent cases of coals (in the Baltic), and sulphur (Naples), will afford illustrations of this.

I may perhaps, in conclusion, be permitted to state—

Remarks.

1. That France appears disposed to induce Great Britain to alter her existing law and practice in these respects, without offering to make any corresponding change by way of concession on her own part. At least, I do not perceive what particular change or concession France proposes or offers.

Question of egress from Baltic and Danube.

2. The Baltic ports of Russia were actually and formally blockaded by the British forces alone before the French fleet joined. On the institution of such blockade, nothing was said about egress for a particular period, and thus the question is practically settled and at an end as to those ports, except for the future.

I am not aware whether any such egress was permitted from the Danube, which was a joint blockade; but, if it was not, this would furnish an additional argument against any such concession.

Warning and search. Necessity for agreement.

3. That, especiallly as to actual warning and endorsement of each ship's papers, and as to searching neutrals under convoy, it would seem essential to come to some decided arrangement with France as to what is to be done where the forces of both countries are actually and jointly engaged in the same service or operation.

For instance: are all the ships to obey the directions on these points of the Senior Officer? or is each ship to act according to the standing instructions of her own Government? Thus, is an English Commanding Officer of a blockading force to be authorized to order French vessels to capture all vessels sailing from a neutral port after a certain date without regard to their not having been "warned off" the blockaded port?

Again, is a French Commanding Officer to be authorized to order Her Majesty's ships not to search any vessels under convoy, merely because the convoying officer has given the requisite assurance, even although reasonable grounds of suspicion should exist that such vessels have contraband of war, destined for the enemy's use, on board?

The speedy and decisive settlement of these points is, I conceive, essential to the proper employment and harmonious action of the allied naval forces, and their remaining open to doubt may be found (when too late) productive of many serious results.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received June 29.)

Doctors' Commons, June 28, 1854.

My Lord,

Manner of effecting blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of this day's date, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a despatch from Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe respecting the manner in which the blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea can most effectually be established, notified, and enforced; and to request that I would take the same into immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon the subject with as little delay as possible, in order that the necessary instructions to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe may be sent by telegraph to Marseilles, where it will overtake a messenger dispatched this evening to Constantinople.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the plan of operations described as the "second measure," in the note of Admirals Dundas and Hamelin, will, in my opinion, be the only means of establishing a valid, legal, and effectual blockade of the Russian ports. As I understand that measure, it is the stationing a sufficient force so near each port blockaded as to make egress therefrom or ingress thereto impracticable without evident and imminent danger of capture.

Each port must be actually blockaded.

Porte may refuse to clear vessels.

They must not be stopped at Bosphorus unless Russian ports are actually blockaded.

The Turkish Government will of course be justified in refusing to permit vessels to clear out from its custom-houses for an enemy's port, more especially for a blockaded port, and also in warning and indorsing the papers of every neutral passing through the Bosphorus when an effective blockade of Russian ports is established; but it would not be justified nor would the Admirals be justified, in my opinion, in preventing neutral vessels from proceeding through the Bosphorus into the Black Sea, nor even from proceeding through the Bosphorus to Russian ports, unless and until such ports are effectually blockaded in the ordinary manner.

Precise notices of blockades.

I beg to refer to my previous reports, especially that of 25th May,* on the effect of notification of blockade, and that of 29th May† on the note of the American Minister (Mr. Buchanan), and to represent the necessity of the admirals furnishing a distinct enumeration and list of each of the blockaded ports (as lately done by Sir Charles Napier), and also of their stating from what date each port has been or is actually and effectively blockaded, which Sir Charles Napier did not state, in order that a proper notification may be issued.

Proposed instructions.

I would further suggest that it will be desirable, in order to avoid mistakes similar to that committed by Sir Charles Napier on his sailing from Kioge Bay (see my report thereon dated 20th April),‡ to instruct the Admirals not to issue any formal notification until they are informed that the blockade is effectively established, and then to give in such notification the date of the blockade in each case, and the dates and names of the ports.

I have ventured in haste to send herewith a blank form of notification for the guidance of the Admirals which may be adapted to circumstances.

Answer to American Minister.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 29th ultimo,† stating my opinion with respect to the application which had been received from Mr. Buchanan, the American Minister at this Court, for permission for American vessels to go to Russian ports, in order to convey from those ports merchandize purchased before the war, he was directed to transmit to me the draft of a note which your Lordship proposes to address to Mr. Buchanan upon this subject, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether the proposed answer to Mr. Buchanan is right and proper.

Mr. Hammond is at the same time pleased to request that I would state to your Lordship whether the quotations from Mr. Wheaton and Chancellor Kent are correctly given in the inclosed draft.

‡ No. 77.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I consider the draft in question to be right and proper as far as it goes, subject to some trifling alterations which I have suggested in the margin, and that the quotations from Kent and Wheaton are therein correctly given.

No authority for such demands.

I would, however, further venture, with great deference, to point out that the draft appears to me to be susceptible of certain additions which would increase its form and effect, especially having regard to the probability of its being hereafter made public; and I would beg to suggest, in reference thereto, that Mr. Buchanan may properly be asked on what authority he relies for his demands as to the ingress of American vessels to blockaded ports, and as to their egress from such ports with cargoes laden after the establishment of the blockade, and also whether the United States have ever, and when made, or whether they are ready to make in favour of Great Britain, or of any and what other nations, similar concessions to those which he requires. It may, I believe, be truly stated that no other Power has, as yet, made similar demands or concessions. That he may also be reminded that such concessions cannot be limited to one neutral Power, especially in blockades. That Her Majesty having a naval ally in the war would, of course, prevent her from making any special concessions without the full consent and concurrence of such ally; and that she must reserve to herself the entire right of making such alterations, not at variance with the principles of international law, as her interests and those of her allies may require.

Any concessions must be concurred in by allies.

Lastly, it appears to me most important that Mr. Buchanan should be required to distinguish clearly between what he demands as rights under the law of nations and what he asks as special and exceptional favours or concessions to the United States.

It will, of course, occur to your Lordship to inquire whether Mr. Buchanan has addressed any and what similar communication to the French Government, and what answer he has received. If he has not done so, the omission will be properly open to severe remark.

Doctors' Commons, July 1, 1854.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th ultimo, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 28th ultimo,* relative to certain points of maritime law on which the opinions of the British and French Governments do not wholly coincide, he was directed to transmit to me a Memorandum which your Lordship proposes to place in the hands of the French Ambassador, declaring the views of Her Majesty's Government in this matter; and to request that I would report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Compromise with France on law of blockades.

As to exemption of naval officers from obeying orders of superior officer of ally: Inexpedient.

That the only part of the Memorandum in question on which I consider it necessary to offer any remark is the concluding passage, which suggests that an understanding should be come to by the Governments of France and England to exempt the naval officers of each nation, under certain circumstances, from the duty of implicit and unhesitating obedience to the orders of their commanding officer when he is not of their own nation. This is so serious a matter that, unless the concurrence of the Admiralty and of the chief naval officers of each nation should have been previously obtained, I must venture to submit to your Lordship that it is not expedient to make such a proposal.

I would respectfully suggest to your Lordship's consideration (as an illustration of my meaning) the probable case of a joint blockade commanded by a British officer, and attempted to be violated by a neutral, by sailing for the blockaded port after knowledge of an official notification. No British vessel being in a position to capture her, a signal is made by the British commanding officer to a French blockading ship to capture and detain her. The proposition in the Memorandum (as I understand it) would either prevent such a signal being made, and thus render the blockade defective, and allow the neutral to escape, or it would authorize the French officer to refuse to obey the signal, because the neutral had not been warned, nor had her papers been endorsed, which (as I read the French naval instructions) is absolutely necessary to authorize a capture for breach of blockade.

Implicit obedience in all such cases appears to be as necessary in allies as in subjects, and any difficulty might, in my opinion, be better obviated by sending the prize before the Court of that country, which would condemn her, or even by releasing her after such detention as would operate as a punishment, than by authorizing disobedience of orders, or preventing complete unity of action in naval operations, by a combined force.

My Lord,

Russian vessels sailing under Tuscan flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd instant, stating that I shall perceive by the inclosed correspondence with Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, and Her Majesty's Consul at Leghorn, that a practice has prevailed in Tuscany to a considerable extent of allowing Russian vessels to assume the Tuscan flag. Mr. Hammond was directed to request that I would consider this correspondence, and report to your Lordship my opinion how far Her Majesty's forces can legally go in stopping vessels which, being originally Russian, are now sought to be protected as neutral by the display of the Tuscan flag, without, as it would seem, in many instances, really undergoing any other change as regards their crews and the conditions under which they are navigated than that of hoisting the flag of a neutral instead of that of a hostile Power.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to call my special attention to that passage in M. Baldasseroni's letter to Mr. Scarlett, of the 11th instant, in which he seeks to set up the identity of a merchant vessel and the merchandize carried on board it, and contends that, as by the declarations of England and France a neutral flag will protect an enemy's goods from capture, a neutral flag ought also to protect an enemy's ship from capture.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the correspondence into consideration, and have to report—

That, with respect to the general principles prevailing in British Prize Courts as to the purchase by neutrals of enemy's ships, I beg to refer to the Reports of the Law Officers of March 28,* the "Themis"; April 11,† on the general question; and May 24,‡ transfer of ships at Lubeck. The French law refuses altogether to recognize such transactions if entered into during war, and is, therefore, wholly different from the English law in this respect.

Transfers before commencement of war.

With respect to the transfers or purchases of the particular ships in question, I have to observe that the dates of such transfers are not given, but that several of them appear to have taken place before the war could be considered as known at Leghorn to be imminent.

I do not conceive that Her Majesty's Government can safely issue any instructions for capturing these particular vessels.

Transfers made after the war was known to be imminent, and especially if made after it was known to have commenced, would be more open to suspicion; still, unless upon the face of the ship's papers, or by the evidence of the master and crew, it could be established that there was an absence of bona fides, a secret understanding or reservation in favour of enemies, or some other strong legal ground for suspicion of fraud, I am opinion that such captures could not be supported in a British Prize Court.

If the ship's papers be in order, a captor detains a neutral at great risk; such suspicion as is alluded to by Mr. Macbean, as arising from the ostensible owner being a banker, for instance, will not justify capture. There must be some strong legal evidence, arising either from the state of the papers or the statement of the master, that the ship is not neutral property, but really belonging to an enemy.

I cannot say that the particulars stated by Mr. Consul Macbean would be of themselves sufficient to justify capture, excepting as to the vessel No. 8, "Prosperita."

In the event, for instance, of such bills for repairs as he alludes to, or any similar documents, being found on board of her, showing that she is still a Russian vessel, I consider that she might be captured with a fair prospect of condemnation.

As to neutral flag protecting enemy's ship.

With reference to the argument of M. Baldasseroni, that ships are to be considered as goods under Her Majesty's Declaration of March 28, I have to observe that this argument is erroneous and unfounded, and I beg to refer on this point to the report of the Law Officers of May 3,* especially to the last words therein.

No objection to proper transfers.

I may generally add that, provided the fair value of the ship is actually paid by the neutral purchaser, and that they are duly documented as Tuscan before they leave the Tuscan ports, there seems no reason to complain of the Tuscan Government for affording facilities to such transactions; and inasmuch as Her Majesty has in the present war offered unprecedented facilities to neutrals engaged in commerce with the enemy, there does not appear to me to be any peculiar reason for great strictness as to the purchase of enemy's ships by neutrals, which was always permitted by Great Britain.

My Lord,

Baltic blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 29th ultimo, stating that, with reference to my reports of June 16,† respecting the blockade of Russian ports in the Baltic, he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a further despatch from Sir Charles Napier, specifying the territorial limits of the ports blockaded; and to request that I would take this despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion upon the contents of the same, with reference to the inclosed copy of the notification of blockade published in the "Gazette" of June 16.

The former correspondence mentioned in the Admiralty letter is herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Dates of commencement.

That the previous omission of Sir Charles Napier to state the date at and from which the ports in question were actually placed in a state of blockade, rendered the former notification unavoidably imperfect, and may hereafter give rise to difficulties with neutrals. Mr. Buchanan, in his note of May 19, especially requested information on this point, and I have reason to believe that this omission has been noticed by other Foreign Ministers. I know not, however, what communications may have passed on this subject, either with France or with other countries. I must, therefore, leave to your Lordship to consider whether, all things considered, matters had better remain as they are, or whether an additional notification should now be issued, stating the date to be relied on for the legal commencement of each blockade. This latter course appears to me upon the whole to be the most candid, and therefore the most advisable.

As to supplying former omissions.

Adverting to my report on this matter, dated June 16, I have to observe:—

1. That I am still without any information as to whether Cronstadt and St. Petersburgh, or any other ports at the head of the Gulf of Finland, have been blockaded, or, if so, from what date.

Mis-spelling.

2. That I fear that the spelling of the names of ports in the notification of June 16 is still so imperfect as to mislead. "Tio" and "Ned. Tornea," for instance, are, I apprehend, erroneous. "Ijo" and "Neder Tornea" are possibly intended.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands contained in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a letter from the Agent and Consul-General of the Hanse Towns, renewing an application which had already been made by Messrs. Caird and Co. of Greenock for permission to export from this country a cylinder intended to repair a steamer, the property of a Corporate Steam-Packet Company at Lubeck, on the grounds that the refusal of the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council to grant such permission was caused by the incorrect manner in which Messrs. Caird had stated the actual facts of the case; and he was to request that we would take Mr. Colquhoun's letters and its inclosures into our consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion thereon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have considered the several papers transmitted to us, and have the honour to report—

Legal. Matter of policy.

That we are of opinion that this is altogether a question of policy. As the steamers in question belong to the subjects of a neutral State, there will be nothing illegal in allowing the exportation of the cylinder as requested.

English and French law as to sale of enemy's ships.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands contained in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a note from Count Walewski, inquiring whether the English law cannot be assimilated to that of France in regard to the sale of enemies' ships, and to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon.

Mr. Hammond also transmitted on the 3rd instant a further note from Count Walewski upon the subject in question.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the several documents so transmitted into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

Rights of neutrals cannot be abridged.

That, inasmuch as this is a question depending on international law, and as that law appears to us to sanction the bonâ fide purchase by neutrals of enemies' ships during war, we are of opinion that it is not competent to this country to abridge the rights of neutrals under such law without their consent. It appears to us that the Order in Council of 1807 proceeded upon the principle that the French Government, having declared its intention not to observe the law of nations in this respect, the British Government was entitled to retaliate.

We are, therefore, of opinion that Her Majesty's Government cannot consent to assimilate the English rule in regard to the sale of enemies' ship to that of France, with a due regard to what this country has always acknowledged to be the rights of neutrals.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Papayanni and Co. respecting the cases of two vessels belonging to them, both clearing out of Reni, a Russian port, and which are already seized by the Turkish authorities; and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Papayanni.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Explanation of Turkish procedure necessary.

That I can only suggest that Her Majesty's Consul at Constantinople should be instructed to furnish an explanation of the circumstances relating to the capture of the "Evangelistria" and her cargo, and also, if possible, of the principles on which the Turkish Government proceeds in these and similar cases.

The "Panaja Valacherena" is not even stated to have sailed, and I cannot recommend any interference in her case, as it is possible that she may not be captured. The Consul's attention may be directed to the case of this ship.

Messrs. Papayanni and Mussabini being British subjects, and consequentially not neutrals, and stating that the cargoes of both these vessels are their own property and were shipped after the war in an enemy's port, I conceive that the Turkish Government was primâ facie justified in capturing them as being engaged in trade with the common enemy, unless that Government should have made any express exemptions in their favour or there should exist any peculiar circumstances relating to them of which I am not aware.

It may perhaps be sufficient to inform Messrs. Papaynni and Mussabini that the attention of Her Majesty's Consul has been directed to the case of the "Evangelistria," but that Her Majesty's Government cannot at present undertake to interfere in that case; and that in the case of the "Panaja Valacherena," Her Majesty's Government see no sufficient reason for interfering at present. I may add that the dates and circumstances are so shortly and briefly stated that it is difficult to advise with any confidence on the case, especially as I am entirely ignorant of the Turkish prize law and practice.

Booker.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I would venture to suggest that this case (like many others on which I have previously reported) is one in which Messrs. Booker ought not to receive any answer at all, inasmuch as the publication of an answer which they may receive may tend to mislead others, and to expose Her Majesty's Government to adverse remark, and to prejudice the public interest. The object of the application is, in my opinion, simply to obtain information as to the future intentions and policy of Her Majesty's Government.

Her Majesty's Government cannot answer questions as to future policy.

Subject to this observation, and if your Lordship should be of opinion that Messrs. Booker's application is one which must be answered, I would venture to suggest that they should be informed that, inasmuch as the Danube is blockaded by the naval forces of Her Majesty and her ally, the Emperor of the French, no vessels will be allowed egress therefrom with cargoes unless such cargoes shall have been laden on board before such blockade was established. Law of foreign States should be ascertained.

1. What is the law of , with respect to the purchase by its subjects of foreign ships of a belligerent; more especially when made in the ports of a third neutral country? Refer to the best authorities by chapter and verse.

2. What documents must a foreign ship so purchased by a subject of have on board, and with what formalities must she have complied in order to entitle her to hoist the flag and enjoy the privileges of the State of , especially before she has been in a port of ?

3. What precautions does the law, or do the authorities, or the local regulations of take or require to secure the bonâ fide character of such transactions, and to prevent its flag from being fraudently or unduly used, to cover ships which are either the property of a belligerent, or are not the exclusive and genuine property of its own subjects?

4. Procure and furnish if possible three or four copies of the documents in question.

I beg to add that, having applied to the First Lord of the Admiralty on this subject, he referred me to your Lordship, and expressed his general approval of the suggestion.

It may possibly be unnecessary to have such information from every foreign country; those from which it is most urgently required appear to be Hanover, Denmark, Hanse Towns, Tuscany, Sardinia, and the United States.

Draft Notification.

Notification.

IT is hereby notified that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have been informed by Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., commanding Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the Baltic, that on and from the 26th of June last a strict and effective blockade was actually established by the combined fleets of Her Majesty and of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French of the various ports in the Gulf of Finland as hereafter specified, that is to say, the whole of the ports in the Gulf of Finland to the eastward of Helsingfors and Sweaborg on the Finland shore, including Borgo, Lovisa Pythis, Fredericksham, Werslax Bay, Viborg, Biorko Sound, and all intermediate ports, roads, havens, and creeks to Cape Lubovki in lat. 60·5′ N., long. 29·56′ E.

From Cape Lubovki the line of blockade crosses to Tolboukin Light immediately off Cronstadt, then across southward to off the town of Borki, in the province of St. Petersburgh, in lat. 59·57′ N., long. 29·28′ E.

That a complete blockade of Cronstadt and St. Petersburgh has been effected by the combined fleets who anchored off Cronstadt on the 26th instant.

Proceeding westward, the line of blockade extends from Borki to Karavalda Island; thence to Dalgoiness, and from Dalgoiness to Rolgentpia Point, which includes the Bight of Coporia; from thence to Korngoul Point, which includes Longa Bay; then the River Narva and the whole coast of Esthonia and adjacent islands to Ekholm Light, situated in lat. 59·43′ N., long. 25·48′ E.

And it is hereby further notified that all the measures authorized by the laws of nations and the respective Treaties between Her Majesty and the different neutral Powers will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

Russian loan. Quotation on Stock Exchange.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd instant, stating that he was directed to request that we would report to your Lordship at our earliest convenience our opinion as to whether the quotation of the Russian Loan on the Stock Exchange can be legally prohibited.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That assuming the term "quotation" to import that the Loan has already been completed, and the money actually been paid to the Emperor of Russia, the mere quotation of such a loan on the Stock Exchange cannot be legally prohibited.

Not illegal.

Any contribution by a British subject, wheresover made to a loan by the Emperor of Russia, would (as we have before reported) be treasonable; but if such a loan has been actually made, and the money actually advanced to the Emperor of Russia by persons not owing any allegiance to the British Crown, the quotation of such loan on the British Stock Exchange will not be illegal, the dealing not being with the Emperor of Russia or in any way operating to his benefit.

My Lord,

Dutch vessel, British prize, seized at Harlingen.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th instant, wherein he stated he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying despatch, and its inclosure, from Mr. Annesley, Her Majesty's Consul at Amsterdam, reporting the circumstances under which the Dutch ship "Youge Albert," a prize to Her Majesty's ship "Conflict," having put into the port of Harlingen, was taken by the authorities of that port out of the charge of the British prize crew, the persons belonging to the vessel set at liberty, and the cargo discharged; and Mr. Hammond requested us to take the case into our immediate consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon.

We were also honoured with a further letter from Mr. Hammond dated the 11th instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a further despatch, and its inclosure, relating to this matter, received from Mr. Annesley, Her Majesty's Consul at Amsterdam, and requesting our consideration and report thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have perused and considered the several papers transmitted to us, and have the honour to report—

May demand restoration.

That we are of opinion that Her Majesty's Government will be warranted in demanding the restoration of this ship and cargo, with the view of bringing them to adjudication before the Prize Court of Admiralty.

Prize Court must decide legality of capture.

If any circumstances exist which will warrant the owners in maintaining that the vessel was either unlawfully captured, or has ceased to be a lawful prize, it will be competent to them to raise the question before such Court; but we are clearly of opinion that nothing is shown at present to justify the seizure of the ship and cargo out of the hands of a British prize crew, and the withdrawal thereof from the proper jurisdiction.

inclosures, stating the grounds on which the Tuscan Government seek to justify the transfer of their flag to Russian vessels; and to request that I would take the inclosed despatches into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my early convenience, my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

French law recognizes no transfers.

That, inasmuch as the French Prize Law altogether refuses to acknowledge the validity of the purchase by a neutral of any enemy's ship if made during war, it will be competent for the French Government to give directions for the capture of those of the vessels in question which may have been so purchased, and probably the date of registration required by Tuscan law would be considered by a French Prize Court as the date of the purchase.

English law permits if bonâ fide.

With respect to these vessels being captured by Her Majesty's ships, I can only refer, and adhere, to my previous reports on this subject.

Difficulty of proving.

The question of the validity of such captures would chiefly, if not exclusively, turn—(1) upon the state of the ship's papers, which would, I conceive, in all probability be found to be complete and in order; (2) upon the evidence of the Tuscan master, who would be either really ignorant of any fraud (as having been recently appointed), or who would profess an honest ignorance, and say that he believed in the bona fides of the purchaser, had no suspicions, and knew of no Russian interest existing, and that he was himself a Tuscan, and appointed by the Tuscan owners, who acted in all respects as such in Tuscany.

Upon such evidence it is my opinion that the ships would be restored, and a legal justification and some cause of complaint thus afforded to the Tuscan Government.

License to use Tuscan flag granted by Austrian Consul.

With reference to the brig "Victor," I observe that it is the Austrian (and not the Tuscan) Consul at Constantinople who granted her a license to assume the Tuscan flag. I do not understand this. She is now, however, in port at Leghorn. The "Christians" appears to have returned without any ship's papers at all; they may have been left at Elsinore. This seems very improbable. I presume that she is now in a Tuscan port.

Mr. Macbean's report, especially as to the "Teti," shows how very little reliance can be placed on any of the Tuscan statements.

Transfers in foreign ports.

In case of any alleged transfers to Tuscan owners of Russian ships made not in Tuscany, but in foreign ports, after the war was known at those ports, the opinion of the Law Officers in their report on the "Lubeck" case, May 24,* may justify their capture, provided it takes place before they have touched at any Tuscan port so as to obtain regular and complete Tuscan papers.

The "Odessa" and "Guisappina" appear to be suspicious cases; but without knowing what is the present state of their "ships' papers," I could not advise their capture.

My Lord,

Fictitious sales of Greek vessels to Ionian subjects.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the War Department, inclosing a despatch from the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, relative to the fictitious sale of certain Greek vessels to Ionian subjects, with the view of obtaining the protection of the Ionian flag, and to his power of refusing, at his discretion, to grant sanitary papers to such vessels; and to request that we would report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, our opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Lord High Commissioner may not withhold papers without sufficient proof.

That although by the Ionian law the attestation of nationality appears to entitle vessels to obtain their sanitary papers, yet if such attestation should be fraudulent and merely colourable, the Lord High Commissioner would not be bound to issue the sanitary papers.

* No. 113.

Fraud, however, in such a case is not to be presumed, and we are of opinion that the Lord High Commissioner ought only to withhold the sanitary papers in cases in which he is prepared, under the advice of the Attorney-General, to order criminal proceedings to be instituted against the parties concerned in such fraud.

Transfers of Russian vessels to Tuscan flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 1st instant, transmitting despatches from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, respecting the supposed fictitious sales of Russian merchant vessels, he was directed to transmit to me therewith a despatch from the French Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, inclosing a Memorandum delivered by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Tuscan Minister at Paris on the subject of a remonstrance addressed by the Tuscan to the French Government, on the refusal of the French Consul at Leghorn to affix his signature to the papers of the vessel therein mentioned, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration simultaneously with those already before me, and report to your Lordship whether, in my opinion, there is any objection to Her Majesty's Minister at Florence being instructed, as proposed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, to hold to the Tuscan Government in regard to the refusal of Consular signature to vessels under similar circumstances to those of the "Nicholas Ist," in conformity with the Memorandum of the French Government now transmitted to me.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I see no objection to Her Majesty's Minister at Florence being instructed, as proposed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, to hold to the Tuscan Government, in regard to the refusal of Consular signature under similar circumstances to those of the "Nicholas Ist," language in conformity with the Memorandum of the French Government now transmitted to me (dated "Juillet 1854").

French and English law.

In holding such language to the Tuscan Government, however, it should always be carefully borne in mind that the British law recognizes bonâ fide sales of enemy's ships to neutrals, even in time of war, whilst the French law altogether refuses so to do. I would also beg to call attention to my report of the 16th May,* on an application of Mr. Annesley, Amsterdam, with reference to the caution with which Her Majesty's Consuls ought to act in signing papers, and to state that, under the existing state of matters in Tuscany, relating to enemy's ships said to be covered by the Tuscan flag, Her Majesty's Consuls should sign no documents connected with such ships but those which they are either legally bound or officially instructed to sign.

My Lord,

Treatment of prizes in neutral ports.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Stockholm, requesting instructions upon a question raised by the Swedish and Norwegian Minister for Foreign Affairs with respect to the treatment of prizes in neutral ports.

Lord Wodehouse likewise transmits to us the previous papers referred to in Mr. Grey's despatch, together with a letter from the Board of Admiralty; and requests that, in compliance with the wishes expressed in that letter, we would, in conjunction with the Admiralty Counsel, take Baron Stierweld's objections into consideration, and that in reporting our opinion thereon, we would define the cases of necessity in which the shelter and protection of neutral ports can be legally demanded by officers in charge of prizes.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, in conjunction with the Admiralty Counsel, and have the honour to report—

Protection may be claimed on account of—
(1.) Stress of weather.
(2.) Disabled ship.
(3.) Want of provisions, necessaries, &c.
(4.) Accident.
(5.) Pursuit of enemy (doubtful).

That we are of opinion that the "cases of necessity," in which the shelter and protection of neutral ports can be legally demanded by officers in charge of prizes, may be defined as cases of (1) stress of weather; (2) the disabled state of the ship; (3) want of provisions, water, fuel, necessary stores or medical assistance; (4) the occurence on board of any unforeseen accident, which may render it necessary for the preservation of the ship, the cargo, or the lives of those on board, to enter the nearest port. With respect (5) to the right of a prize (that is of a captured merchant vessel with a prize crew on board) to claim admission into a neutral port in Sweden in order to escape from the pursuit of the enemy (as being, under such circumstances, within the excepted cases of necessity), we have been unable to find any distinct authorities upon the question which is not free from doubt, and upon which we have been unable to arrive at a unanimous conclusion. We think it right, however, to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the expediency of pressing this claim upon the Swedish Government as coming within the terms and spirit of their own phrase, "circonstances majeures."

As to reciprocity.

At the same time we desire to point out that the expediency of so doing will depend upon the course which Her Majesty's Government might be prepared to take on this subject under similar circumstances in the event of Great Britain being neutral in a war between other naval Powers, and desiring to exclude prizes from her ports.

Treatment of captured vessel as man-of-war of the captor cannot be claimed.

The claim for "any captured vessel commanded by an officer of the Royal Navy and bearing the national pendant of the captor, to be treated as a ship of war" (directed to be made in the letter No. 17 to Mr. Grey), was not suggested by, nor founded upon, any legal advice given by any of ourselves, but appears to have been adopted from M. Drouyn de L'huys' letter to Count Walewski of the 12th of April last (upon the Danish instructions), which was laid before the Queen's Advocate, the Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Bayford), and Mr. Phinn, for their consideration, and upon which they reported, on the 21st of April, that they could not advise Her Majesty's Government to join in a note "identic" with that of France.

Such a claim cannot, in our opinion, be legally maintained, excepting in cases where the captured vessel has been previously taken into the naval service of, and is acting as a national vessel of, a belligerent.

My Lord,

Detention of Dutch vessels off Sulina by Her Majesty's ships.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, inclosing correspondence respecting a complaint made by the captains of two Dutch merchant-vessels detained off Sulina by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I assume (1st) that the Danube was not actually blockaded when these vessels were first brought-to and detained.

2nd. That there existed no reasonable ground for suspecting either their national character, or that they had on board, and concealed, any articles contraband of war.

Illegal, if blockade was not established, &c.

If this be so, all that the officers of Her Majesty's ships were legally entitled to do was to ascertain the nationality of the vessels in question and the nature of their cargoes, and they were not entitled to detain these vessels for the time which they appear to have done, or to tow them to Baltchick. The Dutch masters state that they were towed into Custangé at 12 A.M. of the morning after they were detained, and that their cargoes were then and there examined.

If this be strictly true it would render their subsequent detention, and their being towed to Baltchick, less excusable.

It is to be borne in mind that, as I understand the facts, the Dutch masters were bound on a perfectly lawful voyage, even if their cargoes were intended for the enemy's use, and that they were apparently permitted by the Turkish authorities to sail on such voyage from Constantinople; that they had no knowledge of the existence of a blockade of the Danube before they were detained, and that they were not detained even on suspicion of endeavouring to break such blockade, or on any distinct legal grounds, that I can discover.

Dutch vessel, British prize, detained in Dutch port.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of 25th instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 11th instant, he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, reporting the steps already taken by him in the case of the Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert," a prize to Her Majesty's ship "Conflict," and now lying at the port of Harlingen, and requesting instructions on several points likely to be raised in the course of this affair.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th instant, transmitting to us a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, inclosing a note from the Netherlands Minister for Foreign Affairs, refusing to deliver up the Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert;" together with the draft of an instruction which Sir Ralph Abercromby proposes to address to Her Majesty's Consul at Amsterdam.

Lord Wodehouse also transmits the former papers on this subject and requests that we would take Sir Ralph Abercromby's despatch and the inclosed draft of Instructions to Mr. Annesley into our immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, whether in our opinion it would be proper to authorize Sir Ralph Abercromby to give the proposed instructions to Mr. Annersley, or if not, to inform your Lordship what instructions should be given.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 31st instant, transmitting to us a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague on the subject of the "Younge Albert," and to request that we would take this despatch into our immediate consideration, together with the former papers, and report to your Lordship at our earliest convenience our opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Dutch authorities must let her proceed on her voyage.

That the ship the "Younge Albert" must be considered as de facto and de jure in possession of the British Crown; which being so, the British officer and crew in possession are entitled to the protection of the Dutch authorities, and to their assistance to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage to a British port for the purpose of adjudication.

For, although the Queen of Great Britain has detained the vessel as a belligerent Power, yet that detention arises from the vessel having violated a rule of international law admitted by all nations, and which the Dutch Government is bound, in case of the infraction of it by its own subjects, to assist Her Majesty's Government in enforcing by the only means allowed by the law of nations, namely, that of carrying the vessel before a proper tribunal for deciding the question as to the legality of her seizure and detention according to that law.

Legality of capture must be decided by Prize Court.

The question which the Dutch Government appears disposed to raise as to whether the vessel had been illegally captured, as not having broken blockade, cannot properly come under discussion in the present stage of the proceedings, being a question exclusively for the Prize Court.

We collect that the vessel is not in a condition to proceed to sea without assistance being rendered to her as regards repairs, ballast, and pilotage. We think Her Majesty's Government is as much entitled to claim such assistance for the vessel as it would be for one of Her Majesty's ships-of-war if lying at Harlingen under similar circumstances.

Assistance of Dutch authorities may be demanded.

We therefore recommend that application should be made by Mr. Annesley to the authorities at Harlingen, and by Sir R. Abercromby to the Dutch Government at the Hague, to direct that such assistance should be immediately furnished as shall enable the ship to proceed to sea. If the Dutch Government has no authority to compel the service of a pilot, it can have no difficulty in affording the assistance of some competent person it its service.

From what we have already said, it will sufficiently appear that we do not concur in the instructions proposed to be issued by Sir R, Abercromby to Mr. Annesley, more especially as regards the abandonment of the vessel, a course which it appears to us would be highly inexpedient.

If vessel is seized by creditors, validity of claim must be proved.

An intimation is contained in the papers sent to us that process has been issued from a Dutch Court for the purpose of arresting the vessel at the suit of some creditor of the owners. If the vessel has been attached and is in the actual custody of the Dutch civil authorities, and the Dutch Government should assign this proceeding as a reason for not affording assistance, it will be necessary that the validity of such process or suit shall be judicially determined before the English Government will be in a condition to enforce its claims on the Dutch Government.

It will not, however, be necessary that our Representative at the Dutch Court should advert to this point in his communications with that Government, unless it be assigned by them as a reason for declining to accede to his application for assistance.

I AM favoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 31st July, transmitting to me a telegraphic despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, respecting a Russian vessel detained by Her Majesty's ship "Vulture," off Kioge, and requesting to know whether, under the circumstances stated in the despatch, this vessel is covered by the rule laid down as to Russian vessels leaving Russian ports before the 15th of May; and Lord Wodehouse requests that I will take this despatch into my immediate consideration, and that I will report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Buchanan.

That, assuming that the vessel in question is bonâ fide proceeding upon the voyage (to Lubeck) upon which she was permitted by the French Government to clear out from Nantes, I am of opinion that she ought not to be now captured. Her papers should be endorsed so as to prevent any deviation from the particular voyage in which she is now engaged, and information should be given to the French Government of what has been done, inasmuch as, even should she be sold at Lubeck, she may not thereby be exempted from French capture on leaving that port, according to my understanding of the French Prize Law.

My Lord,

Swedish vessels captured for breaking blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying note from Admiral Virgin, the Swedish and Norwegian Minister at this Court, respecting the capture of two vessels named the "Johanna Maria" and the "Normen," by Her Majesty's cruizers in the Baltic, on the ground of their having broken blockade.

Mr. Hammond also incloses a letter from the Admiralty containing Sir Charles Napier's explanations of the circumstances under which those vessels were captured; and is pleased to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon at my earliest convenience.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Legality of capture must be decided by Prize Court.

That I am of opinion that it will be proper to inform Admiral Virgin that Her Majesty's Government see no sufficient reason for releasing either of these vessels, and that the question of their having been legally captured for breaking blockade must be left to the decision of the Prize Court. He may be further informed that Her Majesty's Government can by no means admit that no Russian port in the Baltic was actually or legally blockaded before the 28th of May.

Discussions as to dates of blockades are unadvisable.

Uncertainty of date of Riga blockade.

I strongly recommend your Lordship to abstain from entering into any discussion as to the facts and dates bearing on these and similar cases, either with Admiral Virgin or with the Representatives of any other of the neutral States. The real date at and from which Riga will be considered by the Prize Court to have been effectively and legally blockaded is, I regret to say, uncertain; and from the remarkable and unfortunate omission of Sir Charles Napier to state any such date in his original communication (from which the Notification in the "Gazette" of June 16th was drawn), as well as from the different dates that are (even now) alluded to for the commencement of the blockade of Riga, it must be open to considerable doubt.*

With respect to the cases of these particular vessels, without going into details, I would venture to point out that Admiral Virgin observes an absolute and suspicious

* Sir Charles Napier states the Port of Riga to have been actually blockaded on and from the 17th April; Captain Key gave the first notice thereof on the 12th May. Her Majesty's ship "Archer" is stated by Sir Charles Napier to have been blockading "off the entrance of the Gulf of Riga" as far back as the 15th April, and the 28th April is the earliest date mentioned in the "Gazette" Notification of June 16th.—J. D. H.

silence, both as to the port from which either vessel sailed, or at which they touched previous to their entering Riga, and also as to the dates at which they respectively sailed from or touched at any such ports.

As to the Notice from Her Majesty's Legation at Stockholm, of the 30th of May, to which Admiral Virgin alludes (which I have never seen, and with a copy of which, as well as of all documents of a like nature, I must request to be furnished), it probably alludes to breaches of blockade which might be thereafter committed or attempted by ingress, and not by egress.

I may further observe, that I see no particular reason for indulgence as to either of these vessels. I suspect that they did know of the blockade when they sailed from Riga. At all events, their capture does not appear to have been unjustifiable under the circumstances; but if it should ultimately turn out to have been so, the Prize Court will cause them to be restored, with costs and damages.

As to information of real dates of Riga blockade.

With reference to this, and similar cases which may be expected to arise, I would respectfully suggest that Her Majesty's Consuls at Memel and other neighbouring ports should be instructed to ascertain—

1. On what day it was first commonly known or supposed at Riga that the port was actually blockaded.
2. On what day the blockade was officially and certainly known at Riga.
3. Whether any and what legal evidence of this could be procured.

Purchase of ships of belligerent Powers.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th ultimo, stating that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty having suggested to your Lordship that information should be procured from abroad respecting the practice of foreign nations in regard to the purchase of ships from belligerent Powers, he was directed to transmit to me, for my information, a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, inclosing the replies given by the French Government upon this subject.

As to negotiations for bringing French and English law into harmony.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to add that if I should have any suggestion to offer in regard to bringing the practice of the two Governments in this matter into more harmonious action, your Lordship would be glad to receive them.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I would respectfully venture to suggest that, with a view to bringing the practice of the two Governments into more harmonious action, it would be desirable that negotiations should be opened with the French Government for the purpose of inducing it, at least, to recognize the bonâ fide purchase of Russian ships made by British subjects after the declaration of war.

As the French Prize Law now appears to stand, and especially under the "Règlement du 26 Juillet, 1778," Article 7, a Russian vessel, though bonâ fide purchased by a British subject, and even though duly registered as a British vessel, would be liable to French capture and condemnation; but inasmuch as such purchases would be in many cases valid by English Prize Law, the existing conflict of law on this subject between the allied belligerents is obviously calculated to cause embarrassment and injury to British interests.

White Sea blockade. Egress through.

the Netherlands Minister at this Court, requesting to be informed whether neutral vessels which shall have entered the port of Archangel, and have embarked their cargoes before the commencement of the blockade of the White Sea on the 1st August next, will be permitted egress from that port with their cargoes.

Lord Wodehouse states that he is further directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Archangel on the subject of the blockade of the White Sea; and to request that, in taking these papers into consideration, we would report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, our opinion as to the reply to be returned to Baron Bentinck.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Neutral vessels, loaded before blockade, will be released on producing proofs.

That we are of opinion that the proper reply to be returned to Baron Bentinck will be to the following effect:—Neutral merchant vessels having on board cargoes which were bonâ fide purchased and delivered on board before the day of the commencement of the blockade will be permitted, on proof of such facts, to proceed on their voyage; but inasmuch as every loaded vessel coming out of a blockaded port is primâ facie liable to seizure, all such vessels will be detained by the blockading squadron, and conducted to the nearest Admiralty Court for adjudication, and will not be liberated except on proof of the cargo having been completely taken on board before the commencement of the blockade.

The Law Officers of the Crown to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received August 8.)

My Lord,

Dutch vessel, British prize, detained at Dutch port.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of August 7, stating that, with reference to our letter of July 31, he was directed to transmit to us a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, respecting the detention of the "Yonge Albert" at Harlingen, together with a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a Report from Lieutenant Dickens, who had been sent to Harlingen to inquire into the circumstances of this case; and to request that, in taking these papers into consideration, we would report to your Lordship at our earliest convenience, with any remarks we may think proper to make thereon.

We have accordingly taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it appears to us that no proceeding can be taken for the removal of this ship from the port of Harlingen which will not involve the risk of a serious collision between British subjects employed for that purpose and a Dutch mob, unless there is a direct official interposition on the part of the Dutch Government.

May demand her release and assistance.

We are clearly of opinion (inasmuch as we collect from the papers that the creditors' suit in Holland has been suspended or abandoned) that Her Majesty is entitled by the law of nations to demand from the Dutch Government the direct exercise of its authority for the purpose of enabling her officer to obtain in Harlingen such ballast, stores, and assistance as are requisite to make the vessel ready for sea, and the aid of a pilot or other competent person to take her out of the harbour.

We recommend that a firm requisition to this effect be presented to the Netherlands Government at the Hague, and that the naval officer who has been sent to Harlingen to take possession of the vessel be instructed to carry into effect what may be necessary to be done, and to take her to sea when the Netherlands official protection and authority has been obtained.

No. 166.

The Law Officers of the Crown to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received August 9.)

Lincoln's Inn, August 9, 1854.

My Lord,

Dutch vessel, British prize, detained in Dutch port.

WE are honoured by a letter from Lord Wodehouse of the 8th instant, in which, with reference to former letters on the subject of the "Yonge Albert," his Lordship transmits to us a telegraphic despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, together with a letter and its inclosures from the Admiralty upon this case, and his Lordship states that he is directed to request us to take the aforesaid papers into our consideration, and to favour your Lordship as soon as possible with our opinion thereon.

Part of the telegraphic despatch referred to in Lord Wodehouse's letter appears to be in the following words: "The Dutch Government will facilitate the departure of ship if proved to be in our possession;" and Sir Ralph Abercromby inquires whether he may "prove that by hoisting British flag at all risk, making Dutch Government responsible for safety of crew."

In obedience to your Lordship's direction we have taken the matter into our consideration, and beg to report as follows:—

It appears to us that the proof which the Dutch Government desires cannot be the proof afforded by an act of force, such as that of "hoisting the British flag at all risk," and we cannot recommend any such step to be taken as at all likely to extricate the matter from its present embarrassment.

As to proof of possession to be given by British officer before being allowed to depart.

It is uncertain to what the Dutch Government intends to refer. By the accompanying letter of Lieutenant Dickens it appears that legal proceedings by the alleged creditors of the Dutch owner have been revived, and that the vessel is now under legal arrest, and therefore in the possession of the Dutch Judicial authorities. That being so, it is probable that the Dutch Government means that the British right to the possession of the ship must be asserted and proved before the Dutch Tribunal. Her Majesty's title to the ship can be adjudicated on by her Court of Admiralty alone, which is the sole tribunal having exclusive right to condemn or release the vessel; but, having regard to the fact that the ship was taken into, and is now in, a Dutch port, in a manner quite at variance with the duty of a belligerent detaining a neutral ship (such duty being to take her direct to the Court of Admiralty for adjudication), we recommend (if this be the meaning of the Dutch Government) that Her Majesty's Consul, Mr. Annesley, be directed to intervene in the Dutch suit, so far only as to prove the fact that the vessel was taken and detained by one of Her Majesty's ships of war, and was dispatched, in possession of a prize crew being in the service of Her Majesty, to the English High Court of Admiralty, and that such crew have always since been, and are still, on board, and have the legal possession of the vessel on behalf of Her Britannic Majesty. Care must be taken not in the least degree to recognize the Dutch Tribunal as having any competency to try the English title; but that title must be simply stated as superior to all municipal and civil rights, and as putting an end to the competency of the Dutch Tribunal.

Legal proceedings of creditors.

This course, however, must not be adopted unless the Dutch Government shall specifically and expressly declare, in answer to the requisition which we have already recommended should be made, that it cannot render official assistance to the English Consul for removing the vessel, by reason of the pendency of the Dutch legal proceedings.

But possibly the Dutch Government does not, by its expression "proved to be in our possession," mean to refer to the legal proceedings, but only to require some official proof to account for a Dutch merchantman, stated to have been captured by a British ship of war, having been brought into the port of Harlingen. If this be the meaning, we think, again having regard to the unusual circumstances of the case, that it will not be improper to direct the British Consul to take, by a notary, affidavits from the British seamen on board of the facts of the capture of the vessel by Her Majesty's ship, of the crew being put on board with orders to carry the vessel to England, and of their continued possession of the vessel from that time until the present. It is possible that this "proof of possession" may be required by the Dutch Government as a ground for its official interference.

If it be so understood, and that the necessary official interposition will then be made, the proof we have described may be afforded.

Our uncertainty as to the meaning of the message renders it impossible for us to give your Lordship a more clear and distinct opinion.

We have, &c.

My Lord,

Blockade of Baltic ports.

I AM honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th August, stating that, with reference to my report of 1st July last upon the question of an additional notification of the blockades of the Russian ports in the Baltic, he was directed to transmit to me (together with the former papers) the accompanying letter from the Admiralty suggesting the expediency of a further notification of the above blockades being published containing the dates on which each port was de facto subjected to blockade, as reported in Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier's letter of the 20th of June. Mr. Hammond requests that I will take the inclosed papers into my consideration, and that I will prepare and transmit to your Lordship at my earliest convenience such a notification to this effect for publication in the "Gazette" as I may think fitting and proper.

Fresh notification with dates of commencement.

I have accordingly prepared, and herewith transmit, such a notification for publication in the "Gazette" as appears to me fitting and proper under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

I cannot of course pretend to say what may be the result or legal effect of the original omission of Sir C. Napier to give the dates of the commencement of the blockade of each of the ports in question, or of the delay which has taken place in carrying into effect the suggestion contained in my Report of 1st July relative to an additional notification.

I conceive that the official letters from Captain Key and Mr. Consul Hertslet, transmitted from the Admiralty to the Queen's Proctor, and by him communicated to me, should, under the circumstances of the case, be printed in extenso.

Notification.

Foreign Office, August 11, 1854.

Notification of blockade.

WITH reference to the notifications of blockades of certain Russian ports in the Baltic Sea, published in the "Gazette" of the 16th June and 16th July last, it is hereby notified that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have (since those dates) received further information from Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, K.C.B., commanding Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the Baltic, from Captain Key, R.N., of Her Majesty's ship "Amphion," Senior Officer off the coast of Courland, and from William James Hertslet, Esq., British Vice-Consul at Memel, relating to such blockades, which information is as follows, viz., Sir Charles Napier states that—

"On and from the 17th April last all Russian ports, roads, harbours, and creeks from latitude 55° 53′ north, longitude 21° 3′ east, to Cape Dager-ort, in latitude 58° 55′ north, longitude 22° 5′ east, including especially the ports of Libau, Windau, Riga, and Pernan, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of Her Majesty's ships.

"On and from the 26th of April last the Russian ports of Helsingfors and Sweaborg, and all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks to the westward of Helsingfors as far as Hango Head, in latitude 59° 48′ north, longitude 22° 53′ east, were in like manner blockaded.

"On and from the 20th May last the Russian ports of Hassal, Warmso Islands, Port Baltic, Revel, and all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks on the coast of Esthonia from Cape Dager-ort to Ekholme Light (situated in latitude 59° 43′ north, and longitude 25° 48′ east) were placed to a state of strict blockade by a competent force of Her Majesty's ships.

"On and from the 26th of June last the Russian ports of Abö, the Islands of Oro and the Aland Archipelago, Nystad, Bjorneborg, Christinestad, Wasa, the Walgrund Islands, Little Carleby, Jacolstad, Great Carleby, Lohto, Kalajoki, Brahestad, Uleaborg, Karle Island, Ijo, Gestila, Kenie, and all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks from Hango Head, in latitude 59° 48′ north, longitude 22° 53′ east, to Ned Tornea (included) situated at the head of the Gulf of Bothnia, in latitude (about) 65° 50′ north, longitude 24° 15′ east, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of the allied fleet.

"On being joined by the French squadron in the Gulf of Finland on the 13th June, the duties of blockading in that gulf and elsewhere were henceforth conjointly carried into effect."

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to inform you that immediately on receipt of your letter of 12th May, which I received on the same day, I communicated the contents of that letter to—

Mr. Grisler, Hanoverian Consul at Memel; Mr. Schiller, Swedish and Norwegian Consul at Memel; Mr. Schröder Sund, Danish Consul at Memel; Mr. Hoeftmann, Hollandish Consul at Memel; and likewise to a number of merchants on the exchange of this town and to several Riga and Libau merchants who were there.

I likewise informed his Excellency Lord Bloomfield that I had communicated the subject of your letters to the Consuls of neutral Powers at Memel.

Copy of an Official Report from Captain Key, R.N., Her Majesty's ship "Amphion," to Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier.

"Amphion," off Windau, June 14, 1854.

Sir,

Report on capture of blockade runners in the Baltic.

HER Majesty's ship under my orders having detained several vessels belonging to neutral nations for attempting to violate the blockade established on this coast, and sent them to England for legal adjudication in accordance with Articles 9 and 10 of the Admiralty Instructions on the subject, I have the honour to report, for your information, the circumstances under which the said vessels have been captured, the manner in which the blockade has been carried out, and other points which may be of importance to the Court of Admiralty commissioned to take cognizance of this question.

Three points must be proved to condemn these vessels as lawful prizes—

1. That an effective blockade has been established.
2. That the vessels detained attempted to violate this blockade.
3. That they were aware of its existence.

Regarding the first point, I have the honour to inform you that since May 9, when I was first entrusted with the blockade of this coast (at which time I found Her Majesty's ships "Conflict" and "Cruizer" on the station, which vessels had been blockading since April 20), two ships have been ordered to cruize off the entrance of the Gulf of Riga, a passage united by the shoals to a breadth of three miles. This entrance has never been left without one vessel. Two other ships have been continually passing between Windau and Memel within sight of the coast.

No doubt in a few instances vessels have succeeded in evading the cruizers under cover of the night and the fogs which have been so prevalent. That the number of vessels boarded is of itself a proof that vigilance has been exercised.

The second point is readily ascertained by a reference to the definition which has been sent in each vessel by the Captain of the ships detaining her, in which the locality, the course the vessel was steering, and the direction of the winds are stated.

With respect to the third point, the knowledge of the blockade, great care has been necessary to prevent injury to innocent vessels. The captured vessels come under two heads—those attempting to enter the blockaded ports and those leaving them. As regards the former, the Captains of Her Majesty's ships received orders that if the slightest reasonable doubt existed as to the Captain or the owner of the vessel being informed of the blockade, she was to be sent away with a notification to that effect on his papers.

Under these orders 154 vessels have been warned off since April 20, although nearly all of them passed through the Sound, communicating at Elsinore, which scarcely allows a doubt to exist of their knowledge of the blockade. Nevertheless, I deemed it my duty to show as much leniency to neutrals as was compatible with the interests of the allied Powers. Four vessels only have been detained for attempting to enter the ports. Two of these contained coal and were without proper papers, the others were from Copenhagen, and confessed their knowledge of the blockade.

To insure that the residents in the blockaded ports should not plead ignorance of their condition, I wrote the accompanying letter to Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Memel, the contents of which were published in the "Berlin Gazette" and were publicly made known at Riga, Libau, and Windau. Mr. Hertslet's answer I inclose.

Notwithstanding this, several vessels have taken in cargoes and left Riga; they have, therefore, been detained and sent to England for adjudication.

The Law Officers of the Crown to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received August 11.)

Capture of Netherland vessel with artillery or waggon harness.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands contained in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us copies of despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Berlin, with their Inclosures, and also a note verbale communicated by Count Bernstoff relative to the circumstances under which the Netherland vessel "Wilmina" had been captured by Her Majesty's ship "Archer" and taken into Pillau; and that he was to request that we would take these despatches into our consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the proper course to be pursued in this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the several documents so transmitted into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it appears that the "Wilmina" was on her voyage to Königsberg, consigned to a well-known Prussian house of business, and that among her cargo, which was of a general nature, the English officer found four casks in which were packed, among many miscellaneous articles of hardware, a quantity of chains, which are represented by the English officer to be such as are used for artillery harness, and to be expressly adapted for that purpose, but which are stated by the Prussian Memorialists to be such as are commonly used in those countries for the harness of ordinary carts and waggons.

Conflicting evidence.

These four casks are stated by the English officer to have been entered in the ship's manifest as consigned to "M. de Witte, a well-known expediting merchant, agent of the Imperial Bankers Flughtz and Co., at St. Petersburgh." On the contrary, in the letter of C. E. Elsasser, the same four casks are stated to have been cleared "to the address of Mr. Molke at Königsberg, old well-known ironmongers."

The ship's manifest is not among the papers, and it is not easy to come to any satisfactory conclusion amid such conflicting statements.

Onus of proof on captor.
Vessel should be released.

It is, however, clear, that the onus of proving that articles such as these, admitting of a variety of purposes, were expressly intended for warlike use, lies upon the captor; and it not only appears to us that there are no means of proving any such fact in the present case, but rather good ground for inferring the contrary, and we therefore recommend that the detention of the vessel be not insisted on.

My Lord,

Dutch and Danish vessels captured in Baltic.

I AM honoured by Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th August, transmitting to me notes which have been addressed to your Lordship by the Danish and Netherlands Ministers at this Court complaining of the capture by Her Majesty's cruizers in the Baltic of several Danish and Netherlands merchant-ships for breach of blockade.

Lord Wodehouse further transmits to me the reports which have been received by Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier of the circumstances under which these vessels have been seized, together with the drafts of the replies which your Lordship proposes to return to the notes from General Oxholm and Baron Bentinck, and requests that I will take these papers into my immediate consideration, and that I will report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion of the proposed replies.

I have accordingly taken these papers into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, adverting to the reasons stated in my Report of the 7th August,* on a similar application from Admiral Virgin, and to the additional notification prepared for publication and forwarded by me with a Report dated the 11th August,† I do not consider the proposed replies to be expedient. The questions for determination in each of these cases are—

1. Was an effective blockade of Riga in existence at the time when these vessels were captured?

As to violation of blockade.

2. Did they know of it and attempt to violate it?

I can see nothing in any of these cases to make the innocence of the master apparent. This, in my opinion, ought to be clearly established in order to justify the release of any of the vessels.

Prize Court must decide.

I consider that both questions ought in each of these cases to be left to be decided by the Prize Court, by which costs and damages may be awarded if any of the captures were unjustifiable.

In the present unfortunate state of doubt as to the date from which the blockade of Riga and of other Baltic ports is to be held as legal and effective, I consider it very unadvisable to enter upon any discussion of that question with neutral Ministers. When one or two leading cases on the subject have been decided by the Prize Court, we shall be in a better position to deal with these and similar demands.

* No. 162.

† Query 10th. See No. 167.

It is possible that some of these cases may be submitted to me by the Queen's Proctor for my opinion, and that on seeing all the papers and evidence I may advise restoration without bringing the case before the Court, but this is a very different thing from acceding to the demand of the Minister of a neutral country.

The "Yonge Albert" is (I presume) the vessel now detained at Harlingen, and I would venture to suggest the expediency of informing Baron Bentinck that until that case is arranged in a satisfactory manner, Her Majesty's Government will be disinclined to listen to any application whatsoever in favour of Dutch prizes.

General rule. Vessels may leave blockaded ports if they entered before blockade.

He may be informed (agreeably to his request) that as a general principle, and in the absence of special circumstances, neutral vessels, if entering a blockaded port before the blockade, will be permitted to come out in ballast.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th August, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatches from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, requesting to be instructed as to the proper mode of dealing with vessels which have been detained in the Black Sea by British cruizers, under the circumstances stated in the inclosed papers; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon this subject at my earliest convenience. I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th instant, transmitting for my further information a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing Vice-Admiral Dundas' announcement of the joint blockade of the Danube.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Blockade of Danube. Ingress and egress. Rules regulating.

That, although the terms of the joint notification of Admirals Dundas and Hamelin of the blockade of the Danube dated June 1st are unfortunately not wholly free from ambiguity, I am of opinion that it must be considered and treated as an ordinary notice of an ordinary blockade to all intents and purposes, and as such prohibiting egress from, as well as ingress to, the Danube, at all events until a Prize Court of one of the belligerent Powers shall have put a judicial interpretation upon it.

The notification in the "Gazette" of June 13 was drawn up from a telegraphic despatch from Mr. Fonblanque (see my report thereon of June 13th),* and contains no ambiguous expressions.

I am accordingly of opinion that there is no sufficient ground for the arguments and observations of Baron Tecco, in his despatch to Lord Stratford of the 23rd July, and of M. Zuylen de Nyvelt to Lord Stratford of the 22nd July; a blockade is as much violated by egress as by ingress, the only exception being that vessels entering before the establishment of the blockade are entitled to come out either in ballast or with such cargo as was actually laden on board before the blockade was established;† but all vessels coming out will nevertheless be primâ facie liable to capture and condemnation, and they will be entitled to be restored only in the event of their proving before the Prize Court any circumstances entitling them to exemption. This principle appears to me to dispose of the Sardinian case of the "Innocente," as far as I understand it at present. Prizes captured for breaking blockade (whatsoever may be their national character) must be dealt with just as all other prizes, and sent with their papers and the necessary witnesses, i.e., the master and two or three of the crew, before the nearest Prize Court for adjudication.

Treatment of prizes.

† See Report of Law Officers on Dutch Questions as to the blockade of Archangel, August 8 (No 164).—J. D. H.

1853-56

The printed instructions for the commanders of Her Majesty's ships and vessels of war as to the disposal of captured vessels are very full and precise on the point, especially Articles 1, 9, and 10 (see also "Regulations for Her Majesty's Service at Sea," chapter 8); and I cannot by any means approve of the entire deviation therefrom apparently contemplated at Constantinople (but not acceded to by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe), by selling the ships with the consent of those interested, and remitting the proceeds, which will be, in my opinion, a highly irregular, if not illegal, proceeding, for which I can see no necessity, and which might expose all concerned therein and Her Majesty's Government to serious liabilities.

Contemplated irregular sale.

I presume that the port of Malta will be "the port in Her Majesty's dominions most convenient," according to the instructions, and that the Prize Commission and necessary machinery there is in "working order;" but of this I have no official information; if not, Gibraltar will be the proper place. It is to be borne in mind that it is the Crown (and not the captors) which is alone legally interested in prizes before condemnation, and as regards foreign nations, and that it is always competent to the Crown to realise a prize at any time before condemnation; if, therefore, the Admiral Commanding and Her Majesty's Ambassador should desire to do so in any case, they should report the circumstances with full particulars and dates (abstract of ship's papers and notes of the master's statement), and on this being submitted to me I could advise thereon.

Realization of a prize before condemnation.

Dr. Pratt's edition of "Storey's Prize Practice" (officially recommended by the Admiralty) might be useful to them for this purpose.

I will merely observe in conclusion that I cannot at present see why the blockade of the Danube and the disposal of prizes taken in the Black Sea should not be dealt with as in other similar cases, the application of Ministers of neutral Powers relative thereto being always referred to your Lordship.

I ought, perhaps, to mention that the Admiralty have printed (confidentially) a Memorandum drawn up by me upon blockade for the use of naval officers, which, though very imperfect, may counteract some of the numerous errors prevailing on the subject.

Destruction of British property by British forces at Uleaborg.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Lewin and Company, of Boston, respecting certain losses which they state they have suffered owing to the late operations at Uleaborg; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, together with the correspondence, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Lewin.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Lewin should be informed that Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to compensate them for their timber destroyed at Uleaborg, which was then in the actual possession of the Queen's enemies, and probaly altogether undistinguishable from other enemies' property, which, as such, was lawfully destroyed by Her Majesty's forces at Uleaborg.

If, however, Messrs. Lewin have any special and peculiar grounds for expecting the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government, such, for instance, as their timber having been destroyed when placed by itself, and detached from other similar property, being plainly marked as their private property, and having been previously pointed out to Her Majesty's officers as such, and nevertheless purposely and designedly destroyed by order of Her Majesty's officers, they should be instructed to set forth these particulars minutely, and possibly to renew their application through the United States' Minister.*

With reference to this case and to similar applications, it would perhaps be desirable that Admiral Plumridge should be requested to furnish a detailed account, accompanied by a plan of the exact position and description of the property destroyed at Uleaborg, and the manner of its actual destruction, and what means were taken (if any) to distinguish between the property of the Russian Government, Russian individuals, British subjects, and foreigners, and to call his attention to Messrs. Lewin's and any similar case.

Notifications of Baltic blockades; complaints of Foreign Ministers of contradictory nature of.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me, for my information, and for any observations I may have to offer thereupon, a copy of a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court respecting the new Order in Council published in the Supplement to the "Gazette" of the 11th instant, and complaining of the hardship of the application of it to the cases of vessels now under discussion.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Baron Bentinck may be informed:—

1. That Her Majesty's Government cannot admit that the notice in the "Gazette," dated Foreign Office, the 11th August, is in "contradiction" to that dated the 16th June, inasmuch as the fact of the actual existence of a blockade on the 28th May is clearly not in contradiction to such blockade having been established de facto at an earlier period.

Evidence of blockade, &c., before Prize Courts.

2. That with reference to the danger which Baron Bentinck apprehends to the Dutch vessels, whose cases are now before the Prize Court, he may be further informed that no such danger exists; the learned Judge of that Court having recently, in the case of the "Union," on the 19th August, refused to be bound by the information recently published, and having directed that neutral claimants should be permitted to prove that, notwithstanding the "Gazette" notice of the 11th August, no valid or legal blockade of Riga was de facto established or maintained as therein stated, and having suspended his decision on all the cases of breach of blockade until the point in question is ripe for determination by the production of further evidence on both sides of the question.

Law of nations does not require a notification of a blockade.

It may, perhaps, be advisable further to remark to Baron Bentinck that his Excellency must be perfectly aware that by the law of nations no general or public notification of a blockade is required; some nations (as France) never publish any such notifications; and many legal and effective blockades have been established and enforced previous to and without any such notification; the notification and publication of all particulars relating to blockade must always be beneficial rather than injurious to neutral commerce; he may be likewise informed that Her Majesty's Government sees with surprise that the Netherlands Government is likely to complain of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in this particular; Her Majesty having unprecedented relaxations during this war in favour of neutrals by which Dutch commerce in particular has largely benefitted. But I would further suggest that a stand should be made against foreign interference with the publication of despatches from Her Majesty's officers. Baron Bentinck may, in my humble opinion, be properly told in reference thereto that Her Majesty's Government cannot admit that any Government has a right to complain of the publication by it of any official communications which may have passed between its officers, and which it may think proper to print and circulate from time to time for the benefit of British no less than of neutral interests.

Foreign interference with publication of despatches.

If your Lordship has any reason to apprehend that the neutral Governments will enter into a serious or protracted discussion on this subject, I would venture to suggest that your Lordship's answer may properly be limited to this last point, especially as I presume that there has been no notification to foreign Ministers in this case, but simply a publication of the despatches in the "Gazette."

Dutch vessel "Yonge Albert." Suggests restoration to Netherlands Government.

OBSERVING by the ship-news in the "Times" of this day that the "Yonge Albert" has arrived in the river, I would venture to submit to your Lordship the possible expediency of restoring that vessel to the Netherlands Government. She is, I understand, of small value, without any cargo, and her ultimate condemnation for breach of blockade is (possibly) very doubtful.

It appears to me that the conduct of the Netherlands Government in the matter entitles it to some consideration, and this would be a fair opportunity of evincing our sense of that conduct without inflicting any serious loss on the captors.

My Lord,

Sales of belligerents' vessels.

Not recognized by French law.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th of August, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 8th of August,* suggesting that negotiations should be entered into with the French Government for assimilating the laws of the two countries in regard to the sale of belligerent ships, or that the French Government should be asked at least to recognize the English law upon this subject, in order that Russian vessels bonâ fide purchased by British subjects might not be liable to capture by French cruizers, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, inclosing the answer of the French Government to the representations made by Her Majesty's Government in this matter; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That, although Her Majesty's Government may have no sufficient interest in the question to induce it to interfere in cases of purchases of Russian vessels made abroad, before such vessels have obtained British papers, yet that with respect to all vessels having British papers, and especially to those purchased from Russians in the Queen's dominions, the most serious difficulty will arise if the French Government should persist in capturing and condemning them as prize.

* No. 163.

The real sufferers by such a proceeding will obviously be, not the common enemy, but the British subject who will have previously paid the price.

The Law Officers of the Crown have, in their Report in the case of the "Norden," dated the 18th of April, 1854,* reported that such purchases will, under certain circumstances, be legal; and upon such vessels obtaining British papers, they will be as fully entitled to British protection and privileges as any other British ships, and their capture by the French must lead to very serious international embarrassment.

The French Naval Instructions on the point being peremptory, it is much to be apprehended that such captures may be made.

Course, if France persists in capturing.

Whatever may be the French Law as to purchases from neutrals, allies are entitled to some consideration in such a peculiar case; but should the French Government refuse to listen to this representation, and should Her Majesty's Government not be disposed to support and protect British purchasers whose ships, purchased from Russians since the war, may be captured by the French, I would suggest that some public notice should be given on the subject.

The course suggested by the French Government (viz., the alteration of the English Law) will not meet the difficulty; even if the law on this subject, as laid down by the British Prize Courts administering the law of nations, could be altered by Parliament (which is open to serious doubt and difficulty), such an alteration could not operate retrospectively, and the validity of all previous purchases from Russians during the war would still be denied by France, and they would be exposed to French capture.

Dates wanted.

THE Judge of the Admiralty (Prize) Court having recently directed that the cases of several neutral ships captured and proceeded against for breaking blockade in the Baltic (especially the blockade of Riga) should stand over for further proof as to the date at which each of such ports was first actually blockaded, and the date at which any such blockade was well known to exist at various neutral ports, especially Elsinore, Copenhagen, Flensburgh, and Hamburgh, and also at the various ports of Sweden and Norway, I have to request that the Queen's Proctor may be supplied with any information on these points of which your Lordship may be in possession, for the purpose of its being put into a legal shape; such information, for instance, as that furnished by Mr. Hertslet in his letter to your Lordship dated August 15, with reference to Memel and Riga.

The practical importance of this matter (especially with reference to recent complaints from various neutral Powers on the subject of the "Gazette" Notice dated the 11th August) will not escape your Lordship's penetration, and has rendered this application necessary on my part.

That the observations which I have already made in my Report, dated the 22nd instant,* on the note of Baron Bentinck on this subject, appear to me to apply to that of General Oxholm. I would, however, suggest that it may not be unadvisable to inquire of General Oxholm what is the latest date at which he is instructed to contend that the authorities at Copenhagen, Elsinore, Altona, and Hamburgh respectively were ignorant of any blockade of any Russian ports in the Baltic; and also at what date he will admit that they were aware of the fact of each, and which of such ports, being blockaded, and at what date each or any such blockade was known, or supposed by them to have commenced. I am induced to make this suggestion because I have already seen many cases in which the Danish authorities have lent themselves with great facility to protecting Russian commercial interests during the war, and I suspect that a pretended or wilful ignorance of blockade will be in many cases set up, and perhaps supported by the Danish officials at various Baltic ports.

Russian vessels condemned in England as prize and purchased by Belgians.

Belgian flag refused by Belgian Government.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels, reporting that the Belgian Government has refused to allow Russian vessels which have been condemned in England as prize of war, and have been purchased by Belgians, to carry the Belgian national flag, and even in one instance has refused to allow such a vessel to enter a Belgian port; and to request that I would take Lord Howard de Walden's despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Belligerent rights may not be questioned by neutrals.

Can't interfere between Belgians and their Government.

That although there can be no doubt that by the law and practice of nations the sentence of a Prize Court sitting in the dominions of a belligerent State confers a perfect and unimpeachable title to the purchaser of any ship condemned as a prize, and thereupon sold in pursuance of such sentence; and although this is a point which neutrals must not be permitted to question, yet I do not see how your Lordship can properly interfere between Belgian shipowners and their own Government, especially in the absence of any application on the subject from any of the parties interested. I cannot, therefore, advise any steps being taken at present in this particular case; but should any opportunity offer, Lord Howard de Walden may, if your Lordship thinks proper, be instructed to intimate to the Belgian Government, in a friendly manner, and without interfering on behalf of Belgians, what are the views which Her Majesty's Government entertain, and are prepared to support, if necessary, on the general question of the sale and purchase of prizes.

Purchase of foreign vessels by Danish subjects.

Nationality of vessels owned by Companies of which foreigners may be members.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 21st instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Cogenhagen, containing certain information as to the state of the law of Denmark with respect to the purchase by Danish subjects of foreign ships, and calling my attention to the regulations by which vessels belonging to a company of shareholders, of whom some may not be Danish subjects, are permitted to enjoy Danish nationality; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to how far this principle should be recognized.

* No. 173.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatches into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the principle relied upon by M. Bluhme as to the Danish nationality of vessels owned by joint stock companies established in Denmark, some members of which may nevertheless be foreigners, appears to me to be correct, and to be consistent with the Report of the Law Officers in the case of Lubeck vessels, owned by a company and navigated to Russian ports, dated April 26.*

I may observe that the same principle will be applied by the British Prize Courts to vessels belonging to Russian Joint Stock Companies which would be condemned as prize, although Danes or other neutrals may hold shares in the company or in the particular vessel. I do not, therefore, see that any observations need be addressed to the Danish Government on this point.

Blockade of White Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of August 29, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying copy of a despatch from Mr. Whitehead, Her Majesty's Consul at Archangel, reporting the establishment of a blockade by the united English and French squadrons of the ports of the White Sea, from Cape Sweetnose to Cape Kanin, to commence from August 1, with regard to vessels bound inwards, and from August 15, with regard to vessels outward bound from those ports; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether it will be necessary that a notification of this blockade should be published in the "Gazette," and if so, that I would draw up a notice for insertion accordingly.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I cannot consider Mr. Whitehead's communication as entirely satisfactory. He does not give any copy of the notification which he states was addressed by the British and French Commanders of the combined squadrons to the Military Governor of Archangel on August 13, nor does he state how he became aware of its purport or precise terms; he does not state that the blockading force was effective and sufficient for the purpose, or that it was either then actually off and in sight of the port, or in such a position as to enforce a strict and effective blockade of Archangel, or where it was; and, whatever the probabilities may be, in the absence of any authoritative statement to that effect, or of any communication from the officers in command, and without seeing a copy of the notification, I conceive that this letter alone is insufficient to found a formal notification.

I observe that Mr. Whitehead states that the Commanders further notified "that the vessels of Russia carrying on the barter trade between the ports of the White Sea and the Province of Finmarken, in Norway," would be allowed to pass unmolested. This would infer that Norwegian and other vessels carrying on such barter trade (whatever this may mean) would be captured; and the exception is so peculiar and unintelligible, without further explanation, that it increases the difficulty of drawing a notification from the letter of Mr. Whitehead alone.

Effects of defective notifications.

I have earnestly and repeatedly endeavoured to forewarn Her Majesty's Government, and to guard against the serious difficulties and embarrassments which these defective notifications of blockade have caused and are likely to cause, and have drawn up a Memorandum on the subject for the use of naval officers, which the Admiralty has caused to be printed; but I regret to say that a complete and reiterated disregard of all rule and regularity on this subject continues to prevail.

I do not understand how Mr. Whitehead could, on August 14, be "Her Majesty's Consul at Archangel," or how he could have on that day obtained so complete a knowledge of the contents of the document in question (received the day before by the Governor), and yet have been unable to transmit a copy, or even to explain why he could not transmit a copy; nor can I understand why he was unable to state the simple fact that the port was blockaded.

If, however, Her Majesty's Government have no further information on the subject, and are not likely to receive any speedily, it will be for your Lordship to consider the expediency of publishing Mr. Whitehead's communication in the "Gazette" for public information, without addressing any formal notification to foreign Ministers resident here.

I may add that the Consular communication as to the blockade of the Danube, upon which Her Majesty's Government founded a notification, turned out not strictly accurate, and may give rise to difficulties, as stated in my Reports of June 13 and August 16, which is an additional reason for caution.

Perhaps in future, on it being the intention of Her Majesty's Government to establish any blockade, they would do well to address special instructions to the Naval and Consular Officers, and to arrange beforehand what steps they should take with regard to its notification.

Dutch vessel proceeding from Memel to Holland, having broken blockade of Riga.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, requesting to be informed whether, under the circumstances stated by him, the Dutch vessel "Anna Arendina" can proceed with safety from Memel to a port in Holland; and to request that I would take the inclosed case into consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Baron Bentinck.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am of course unable to say whether Baron Bentinck's exparte statement of the circumstances relating to the "Anna Arendina" is strictly accurate, or whether there may exist any other circumstances connected with her not alluded to by his Excellency, nor am I aware whether either Her Majesty's Consul at Memel, or Captain Key, R.N., or any other naval or Consular officer has made any communication with respect to her.

Not now liable to capture.

In this state of things I can only say that, assuming Baron Bentinck's statement to be strictly accurate, and to contain all the material facts which are or can be known relative to the case, I am of opinion that the "Anna Arendina" is not now liable to capture for breaking the blockade of Riga, and that the necessary instructions may properly be issued to that effect.

If it be true that Her Majesty's Consul at Memel warned the master that the vessel was liable to capture, I consider that he acted irregularly in giving any such warning, and that he should be so instructed.

Danish Company for purchase of Russian ships and sailing under Danish flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th September, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from M. Baudin, the French Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the proceedings of a company which has been formed in Denmark for the purpose of purchasing Russian merchant ships and navigating them under the Danish flag, and suggesting that the allied cruizers should be instructed to capture all such ships; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Ships may be captured.

French Prize Courts would condemn.

That all purchases of Russian vessels by Danes made since the war are so justly open to suspicion, that all vessels so purchased, whether by this Danish company or by any other company or person whatsoever, will be primâ facie liable to capture by Her Majesty's ships. There will be, however, this important practical difference between the result of captures of such vessels made by Her Majesty's ships and of those made by French ships of war. By the French Prize Courts, I apprehend that every such vessel (if purchased since the war) will be certainly condemned as prize.

British Prize Courts would release if bonâ fide sold.

By the British Prize Courts such vessels will be restored on satisfactory proof that the purchase was not merely colourable, but made bonâ fide without reservation, that the money was actually paid, and that all Russian interest and risk terminated by such purchase. I may further observe that British captors seize at their own individual risk, and that such risk is considerable where no defect or ground of suspicion appears on the ship's papers.

Danish law facilitates fraud.

The Danish law, as administered by the Danish authorities, appears to me to furnish great and undue facilities for fraudulent assumption of Danish nationality by Russian ships; some cases of this description are now before the Prize Court, and on that Court pronouncing sentence in some of these cases (which may be expected in October), it will probably become my duty to report further to your Lordship thereon.

A gentleman named Sorensen, of Russian family, but calling himself a Dane, is mixed up with many of these cases.

In conclusion, I may say that, without knowing anything of the existence or constitution or working of the company in question beyond what is vaguely stated by M. Baudin, I cannot advise the issuing of instructions to Her Majesty's vessels to capture all vessels belonging to such company without distinction. Specific information as to such company would be desirable. The existing circumstances, however, seem to me to justify the addressing a general warning to the Danish Government on the part of the allies, should such a measure be considered advisable, although the condemnation of some ship under Danish colours may be the best warning.

My Lord,

Trade with Russia through Memel.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of August 29, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Charles Paris, in which he requests to be informed whether trade with Russia, through Memel, is to be allowed to be carried on without restriction by British subjects, and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Paris.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this is one of that class of letters which I have frequently reported should, in my humble opinion, not be answered at all. I have further to observe that the two questions to which Mr. Paris requests an answer, viz., "Whether it will continue to be permitted by Her Majesty's Government that the trade with Russia shall be carried on by British subjects unrestrictedly through the port of Memel?" also, "whether the port of Odessa is to be blockaded or not?" are not questions of law or fact, but of intention and policy, as to which Mr. Paris is not entitled to expect private information from your Lordship. As a matter of fact I apprehend that at present—

Not illegal.

1. The overland trade with Russia carried on through Memel is not illegal.

No answer desirable.

2. No notification has been issued of the blockade of Odessa, whether it is to be blockaded or not, or whether it actually is or ever has been blockaded, I am as ignorant as Mr. Paris, nor can I form any opinion of the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to the overland trade with Russia; I regret therefore to state that I am wholly unable to express any opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Paris, and I trust that he will not receive any answer at all.

Fictitious sales of Russian vessels to Tuscans.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th July, stating that, with reference to the question of fraudulent and fictitious sales of Russian vessels to subjects of Tuscany, which has been several times submitted to us, he was directed by your Lordship to request that we would, at our earliest convenience, report to your Lordship whether a vessel, two-thirds of the crew of which are not subjects of Tuscany, is to be considered as having no right to the Tuscan flag, and as being, therefore, liable to capture by Her Majesty's cruizers.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Two-thirds of crew must be Tuscans.

That, if the question intended to be submitted to us be whether a Russian vessel alleged to have been sold and transferred to a subject of Tuscany, but which is found to be navigated by a crew of which two-thirds are not subjects of Tuscany, and consequently not in accordance with the Tuscan law, is to be considered as having a right to the Tuscan flag, we are of opinion that the fact of the ship not being manned and navigated in conformity with the law of Tuscany affords evidence against the validity and bona fides of the alleged transfer, and that a vessel under such circumstances is to be considered as having primâ facie no right to the Tuscan flag, and therefore liable to capture.

Russian vessel, British prize, sold in England to a Belgian.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th August, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels respecting a proposal to bring into a Belgian port, under the British flag, a Russian prize condemned and sold in England and purchased by a Belgian subject; and to request that I would take the statements in this despatch into consideration and report to your Lordship my observations thereupon, and more particularly with reference to the bearing on this case of the Belgian law respecting shipping, transmitted to me in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th August.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have the honour to report—

Refused permission to carry Belgian flag.

That although the ground of the objection of the Belgian Government to allow the use of the Belgian flag to the "Nadeschda" appears to me to be wholly unfounded in law or reason, and arbitrary and unreasonable in practice, and at variance with the usages of nations, yet, inasmuch as this only appears to be the ground of such objection from the applicant's version of a verbal conversation with M. de Brouckère, I cannot advise that any official notice should be taken of it.

(Refusal of entry to British vessels.)

Should the Belgian Government hereafter refuse the right of entering its ports to any duly documented British vessel (whether purchased at a sale of prizes after condemnation by the Prize Court or otherwise lawfully acquired and owned), the matter must be seriously and directly taken up by Her Majesty's Government Cannot carry British flag.

The applicant's desire to be allowed to sail to Belgium under the British flag cannot be complied with. Your Lordship has not the power to do what he desires. An alien cannot by law be registered owner of a British vessel, and no licence nor order will enable him to be such, and unless a vessel has a British certificate of registry she cannot legally use the British flag.

Belgian law.

When a vessel is sold by virtue of a sentence or order of the Prize Court, the Marshal of the Court executes a regular bill of sale of the vessel in the English form to the purchaser of such vessel, and this will entitle him to a British certificate of registry from the Custom-house, if he be a British subject; if he be a foreigner, it is to be presumed that he knows the law of England and of his own country: that he cannot have a British certificate of registry, and that his Consul here and his Government in his own country will give him the necessary papers to enable him to sail under his own flag on his satisfying them that he has duly become the owner, and producing a formal instrument which is a valid and regular conveyance by the lex loci actus; at all events, and more especially with respect to questions between foreign purchasers and their own Governments, the maxim caveat emptor applies to these cases. Assuming that the existing Belgian law on the subject of the purchase of foreign vessels by Belgians is to be found in the "Code des Contributions Directes," pp. 775-778, "Arrêté Royal du Février 1846," as modified by the "Arrêté Royal du 18 Septembre, 1847" (rélatif à la nationalisation des navires étrangers), such law appears to me to leave it to the discretion of the Belgian Government whether it will grant or refuse Belgian Nationalisation Lettres de Mer to foreign vessels purchased abroad by Belgians in each particular case, as it may arise; but this is, of course, entirely a matter of Belgian law and administration as to which I may be in error.

Under these circumstances I would suggest that the applicant may be informed that Her Majesty's Government, although desirous to give him every reasonable facility and assistance, has not the legal power to authorize him to assume the British flag. Whether any or what application should be made on his behalf to the Belgian Government it will be for your Lordship to decide.

I cannot recommend such an application being made, inasmuch as it appears probable that this question will shortly be raised in the case of British vessels, and it would seem therefore premature to enter into any discussion of it upon a Belgian case. I beg to refer to my former Report herein of the 29th August last.*

Blockade of the Danube.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th August last, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 16th, he was directed to transmit, for my information, a despatch which your Lordship has addressed to Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, and a letter which you have caused to be addressed to the Board of Admiralty on the subject of the blockade of the Danube; also inclosing a letter from the Admiralty containing copies of further correspondence on the same subject; and to request that I would return these papers to the Foreign Office.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Egress permitted to Austrian vessels.

Disapproves.

Should be captured and subsequently released.

That, with reference to the determination of the allied Admirals to permit egress from the Danube to Austrian vessels exclusively without making (as I understand it) any distinction as to the time when, or place where their cargoes were laden, or the nature or destination of such cargoes, I should not, if previously consulted, have approved thereof; and I fear that this determination, especially if publicly announced, may lead to serious difficulties with neutral Powers; but, if such determination has been announced, it is now too late to prevent the mischief which may arise therefrom; if, however, it has not been publicly announced, I have to suggest that no such public announcement should be made, but that every vessel indiscriminately should be captured and taken possession of by a prize crew, and that after a detention sufficient to assert the principle, and to leave no doubt of the fact of capture, the Austrian vessel should be released, and their papers endorsed as follows:—"Captured at on by for breaking the blockade of the Danube, and restored on the under special circumstances," or to that effect.
This precaution may not be entirely successful, but it may tend to diminish the difficulties which are to be apprehended.

I must also suggest that instructions of so peculiar a nature as those issued by the French Government relative to the partial relaxation of this blockade in favour of all vessels coming out of the Danube should, in my opinion, be communicated to and considered by Her Majesty's Government before they are issued, so as to insure as much unity of action as possible.

Unity of action of allies requisite.

It is obvious that the success of all conjoint blockade operations by the allies must be greatly hazarded unless precautions are taken beforehand to secure complete unity of action. It is, moreover, to be borne in mind that the British Courts are perfectly independent of all considerations of policy, or of the interests, or intentions of the allies, and will look only to what they consider as strictly in accordance with international law, and that the entire legality and validity of a blockade is hazarded by all exemptions, especially if exclusively in favour of one particular nation.

I have ventured upon these remarks because from recent military and political events it is clear that other similar relaxations or exemptions may be attempted in the case of the Danube, which is in many respects very peculiar, and also because in any other existing or future blockades these points require serious consideration, and all exemptions or relaxations should, if possible, be agreed upon beforehand, and not left to the discretion of naval officers.

Better to permit all egress and to prohibit all ingress.

In this case the French Government appears to have suggested that egress should be free, and ingress forbidden to ships of all nations without distinction. The Admirals have (as I understand them) determined to permit egress to all Austrian vessels, but otherwise to prevent all ingress and egress; the course suggested by the French Government was, in my opinion, by far the best under the circumstances, that adopted by the Admirals being of very doubtful legality. It is to be hoped, however, that the rapid and favourable progress of events on the shores of the Danube may obviate any serious consequences. If Austria has become, or should become, formally an ally and a belligerent, the case would present a very different aspect.

I have, &c.

Search of a Prussian vessel off Memel by a British cruizer.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th September, transmitting to me a Memorandum communicated to your Lordship by Count Bernstorff, Prussian Minister at this Court, representing the treatment to which the Prussian vessel "Louis" had been subjected by an officer of Her Majesty's ship "Amphion" in boarding and examining that vessel off the port of Memel. Mr. Hammond likewise incloses a letter from the Board of Admiralty, inclosing a report from Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier of the circumstances under which this vessel was boarded and searched, together with a Memorandum which your Lordship proposed to communicate to Count Bernstorff in reply to his representation. Mr. Hammond requests that, in taking these papers into my consideration, I will report to your Lordship my opinion as to the propriety of the proposed reply. Mr. Hammond adds that, as your Lordship has appointed Count Bernstorff for an interview on Friday morning, your Lordship will be obliged by a reply to his letter, if possible, by the evening of the 14th September.

I have accordingly taken these papers into my consideration and have the honour to report—

That subject to certain alterations, chiefly verbal, which I have suggested in the margin, your Lordship's proposed reply appears to me to be correct and proper.

I have to express my regret that accidental circumstances should have caused a delay of twenty-four hours on my part in this matter.

Memorandum for Count Bernstorff.

Foreign Office, September , 1854.

COUNT BERNSTORFF on the 8th ultimo communicated to the Earl of Clarendon a Memorandum, representing the treatment to which the Prussian vessel "Louise" had been subjected by an officer of Her Majesty's ship "Amphion," in boarding and examining that vessel, and the Earl of Clarendon is enabled to offer the following explanation of the circumstances under which this vessel was boarded and searched.

The great facilities enjoyed both by the export and import trade of Russia at Memel, which is for all practical purposes the port of Courland and Livonia, render some measures of precaution necessary in order to put a check upon the advantages thereby afforded to the Power with which Great Britain is at war; but these measures have hitherto been put in force with a leniency which has proved no less favourable to Prussian than detrimental to British interests.

The Port of Memel is moreover peculiarly situated with reference to the facilities which its situation affords for supplying Russia with articles "contraband of war." This has induced the Commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers in the Baltic to employ proper vigilance to prevent the carrying on of such contraband trade.

It appears that by orders of the Commander of Her Majesty's ship "Amphion," an officer and boat's crew from that vessel boarded the "Louise," which was approaching the coast in the vicinity of Memel, in order to ascertain the true national character of the vessel, and the nature and destination of her cargo.

1853-56

The officer who executed these instructions distinctly denies that any unnecessary violence was used on the occasion, or that in the course of the examination any official seals or unusual fastenings were broken or even seen, and the inspection of the hold was simply to ascertain whether any articles contraband of war were on board, which would not be entered in the bills of lading, and could not be detected without an examination of the cargo.

Accidental boarding of a vessel within three-mile limit.

With respect to the complaint that the "Louise" was within the limits of the Port of Memel at the moment when she was actually boarded, it appears that although when orders were given to board the "Louise," that vessel was not within those limits, yet that she approached the coast with a fresh breeze, and before the "Amphion's" boat could actually succeed in boarding her, she had got within three miles of the shore. For this accidental irregularity Vice-Admiral Napier desires to express his regret, and Lord Clarendon has to convey that of Her Majesty's Government.

Destruction of British property in attack on Uleaborg by British forces.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, September 28, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th September instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 16th August,* upon the subject of the claim of Messrs. Lewin and Co., on account of the destruction of their property during the late operations of the British fleet at Uleaborg, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Scott, Tahourdin, and Shaw, requesting a reconsideration of Messrs. Lewin's claim, and stating that previous to the attack on Uleaborg the whole of the British property at that place was pointed out to Admiral Plumridge.

Messrs. Scott also inclose an extract of a remonstrance that was made to the Admiral at the time.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would take these papers, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the only additional document now forwarded appears to consist of what is called "an authentic account" of the transactions at Uleaborg; that it is not stated by whom the account was drawn up, nor to whom it was addressed. It appears, however to come from a Russian source. Under these circumstances I do not see that it can have any effect upon your Lordship's decision.

I observe that the real applicants are Messrs. Lewin of Boston, Lincolnshire, not, as I had erroneously supposed, of Boston in Massachussets, and I do not see, therefore, why their London solicitors, Messrs. Scott, Tahourdin, and Co., should conduct the correspondence with your Lordship, or if they do this, why they should bring forward their clients' case (as it were) piecemeal, and offer further information, if required, instead of supplying it at once, Wait for Admiral's Report.

If the correspondence is to proceed, it might be desirable to require Messrs. Lewin to lay the whole case, properly authenticated, at once before your Lordship, but I do not recommend that anything further should be done, at all events until Admiral Plumridge has fully reported on the case, as suggested in my former report.

The solicitors of British merchants resident here should not, in my humble opinion, be encouraged in corresponding with your Lordship on behalf of their clients. The claimants should in all ordinary cases apply to your Lordship directly.

Blockade of White Sea.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th September transmitting to me a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a copy of a letter from Captain Ommaney, notifying the blockade of all the ports in the White Sea; Mr. Hammond requests that I will take the inclosed papers into my consideration, and that if I should be satisfied that they are sufficient, I will prepare and transmit to your Lordship at my earliest convenience such a notification to this effect for publication in the "Gazette" as I may think fitting and proper.

Notification.

IT is hereby notified that on and from the 12th day of August last, all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks from Cape Swiatoi Nos, in longitude 39° 47′ east, latitude 68° 10′ north; to Cape Kanin, in longitude 43° 32′ east, latitude 68° 39′ 12″ north, including especially the ports of Archangel and Onega, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of the allied British and French fleets.

And it is hereby further notified that all measures authorized by the Law of Nations and the respective Treaties between Her Majesty and the different neutral Powers will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

Purchase of Russian ship at Barcelona by M. Vidal (nationality unknown).

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th of September instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from M. Vidal in which the writer, without stating his nationality, requests that steps may be taken to give validity to the purchase by him of a Russian ship at Barcelona, and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to M. Vidal.

In obedience to your commands I have taken the papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

That M. Vidal should be informed that inasmuch as he states himself to be "established" (i. e., domiciled) at Barcelona, where he bought the "Adonis," a Russian vessel, but now sailing under Spanish colours, your Lordship must decline to issue any special directions in favour of that ship.

It may possibly be desirable to communicate with the French Government, and also with the Admiralty and the Customs, as to the "Adonis," inasmuch as the circumstances mentioned by M. Vidal connected with his asserted purchase of her, and the change from Russian to Spanish nationality ensuing thereupon, appear to be open to suspicion.

Unless M. Vidal should be a British subject, which does not appear, he should have applied to Her Majesty's Government through the Legation of his own country.

Blockade of Russian Baltic ports.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, September 30, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd September, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a despatch which has been received from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, inclosing the draft of an affidavit proposed to be taken by him before Dr. Deane as to the dates at which the blockade of any of the Russian ports was known at Copenhagen, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as Dr. Deane has apparently been in communication with Mr. Buchanan, and will again communicate with him, I conceive it best to leave the whole matter in Dr. Deane's hands.

Proposed affidavit as to date when it was known at Copenhagen.

I see nothing objectionable in Mr. Buchanan's affidavit, but I observe that it is silent as to the date at which it was first well known to the commercial public at Copenhagen from any credible source that any Russian ports, and more especially Riga, were in fact blockaded, and from what date they had been so.

This information will be of more practical importance than any information as to the time when, and manner in which, the Danish Government was officially informed of the blockade.

A great number of neutral vessels of all nations having been "warned off," by Her Majesty's ships soon after the blockade was established, it is probable that some of them either returned immediately to Danish ports or passed through the Sound, and there communicated the existence of a blockade in a manner which could not be open to any doubt; and this is the species of information which it would be desirable to obtain in affidavits from Mr. Buchanan or other persons in Denmark; the most important question being, when was it first known in Danish ports as a matter of fact by the public (whether officially or otherwise). Dr. Deane is, however, so fully competent to deal with the whole subject that it may safely be left to him.

Baltic blockade. Complaint of Dutch Minister of contradictory notifications. (See No. 173).

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, October 5, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th September last, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 22nd August, he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Netherland Minister at this Court, containing certain observations in reply to the answer which your Lordship returned to Baron Bentinck's note of the 15th of August, complaining of the Order in Council which was published in the Supplement to the "London Gazette" of the 11th August, and to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's further note into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make thereupon.

The former papers were transmitted, and are returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the further note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the object of Baron Bentinck is obviously to extract some favourable admission from your Lordship, or to take his chance that in the course of the discussion something may occur by which the cases of the "Union" and other Dutch ships may be favourably affected. Inasmuch, however, as Baron Bentinck admits the entire impartiality of the Prize Court (before which these cases are actually pending and in course of litigation, and from which there is an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) your Lordship should, in my opinion, altogether decline to enter upon the discussion opened by his Excellency of certain abstract principles of prize law and practice, or of their application to the particular cases of the Dutch vessels now before that Court.

With reference to the concluding paragraph of his note, he may be informed that in case any Dutch vessel should be condemned as prize by a British Court, Her Majesty's Government could hold out no prospect that she will be restored.

Vessels once condemned cannot be restored.

I may add that although the Crown can always restore a prize before condemnation (as was done in the "Yonge Albert"), yet the legal effect of the sentence, and of the Queen's Proclamation, and of the "Prize Act, Russia, 1854," is to vest the property absolutely in the captors from and after condemnation.

Before I conclude I ought perhaps to add, for fear of any mistakes—

Right of Government to publish documents in proof of blockades.

1. That which was published in the Supplement to the "London Gazette" of the 11th August was not (as described in Mr. Hammond's letter) an "Order in Council," or anything resembling this, but simply extracts from despatches and official communications which had been received from different Naval and Consular officers. In my former report on this case I adverted to the expediency of insisting upon the absolute right of Her Majesty's Government to publish such document at any time, without any interference whatsoever from, or any reference to, the wishes or interests of foreign Governments.*

Proof necessary for condemnation.

2. That in order to condemn a neutral ship for breach of blockade in a British Prize Court it will be sufficient to prove that her master did some act towards the violation of the blockade after he actually knew, from a credible source, of its existence. Neither any official intimation, nor any actual warning by a cruizer, is necesssary.

If, therefore, your Lordship should enter at all into discussion upon this matter with Baron Bentinck, both these points should, in my opinion, be strongly insisted upon.

Divergence in French and English laws respecting.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, October 5, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th September last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a correspondence which has taken place with the Consul-General of the Hans Towns relative to a certain divergence in the laws of France and England as to the liability of vessels purchased after the commencement of hostilities to seizure, Mr. Colquhoun wishes to be informed "whether the British Government, in deciding questions of this description, will be guided by general custom and precedents of decided cases, or statute law, or how otherwise;" and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Colquhoun.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Course pursued by British Prize Courts.

That Mr. Colquhoun should be informed that it is not the British Government, but the British Prize Courts, which throughout Her Majesty's dominions exclusively decide these questions.

That Her Majesty's Government considers all purchases of vessels from the enemy (especially those made after the commencement of hostilities was known by the purchaser) to be justly open to suspicion, and is disposed to send all such cases before the Prize Courts for adjudication.

That Mr. Colquhoun can easily ascertain for himself what are the legal principles by which those Courts are guided in their decisions in such cases by reference to their reported decisions, or by obtaining the best legal advice on the subject from those learned gentlemen who practice before such Courts.

That the decisions of such Courts are notoriously impartial and entirely beyond the control of the Government, which has neither the slightest power or inclination to interfere therewith.

I may add that Mr. Colquhoun must personally have known, when he put the question, that this must be the answer, and possibly a hint to this effect may properly be given to him.

Baltic blockade.

My Lord,

Doctors' Commons, October 5, 1854.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter, dated —— September (received 30th September), transmitting, for my information, a copy of a despatch from Mr. Taylor, Her Majesty's Consul at Elsinore, on the subject of the blockade of Russian Baltic ports, and more especially of Riga. With reference thereto I beg to refer to my Report of the 30th September last* on a similar communication from Mr. Buchanan, and to state that Dr. Deane, who has returned from the Baltic, but not viâ Copenhagen, has recently sent particular instructions to Mr. Taylor on this point, to which his special attention is required.

I request that Mr. Taylor may be further directed forthwith to ascertain and transmit, in the shape of an affidavit, if possible, correct and minute information as to the time when, and the manner in which, it was first known at Copenhagen (not officially, but as a matter of news), or when it was first commonly supposed amongst mercantile men there that Russian Baltic ports, and the port of Riga especially, were blockaded.

Affidavit as to when it was known at Copenhagen to exist.

That Her Majesty's Government have the strongest reason for supposing that, from the arrival of vessels warned off, from statements in the various newspapers published in different ports and circulating in the Baltic, from private commercial letters, ship news, and otherwise, that some knowledge of the blockade (of Riga especially), from sufficiently credible sources, reached the commercial public at Copenhagen long before the 3rd June, and that Her Majesty's Government expect he will use his utmost exertions to ascertain and establish in evidence both this fact and the date when this intelligence arrived in Copenhagen.

Reluctance of Consuls to disclose dates.

I beg to add (in confidence) that I have received private information from an excellent source that the greatest reluctance is shown by all commercial men at the Baltic ports to admit or disclose the dates and particulars of their knowledge of the fact of blockade, and that Her Majesty's Consular officers are, from commercial connections and habits, not so diligent or effective in this matter as could be wished. I do not mean to allude to Mr. Taylor personally, although I cannot think that his information on the point is very satisfactory. The official publication of the intelligence is not the question, but where and how was it first known as a matter of news.

I OBSERVE that amongst the papers accompanying Count Reventlow Criminil's note to your Lordship of the 28th September on the subject of the want of notification of the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic (inclosed in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd October), there is a formal and official declaration from the Danish Consul at Riga, signed "A. F. Kriegsmann, Consul," and dated from the Danish Consulate at Riga, 9th September, 1854, described as a translation from the original, and verified by the official seal and signature of Count Reventlow Criminil, in which document it is stated that on the 14th May the Danish Consul at Riga received from the Danish Consul at Memel an official communication as to the blockade of Riga which is therein set forth. I beg to state that this document will be of the utmost importance as evidence in the Prize Court on a point upon which several cases are now depending, viz., the date when the blockade of Riga was known to be in existence by masters of neutral vessels lying in that port, and I have accordingly to request that this document may be immediately communicated to the Queen's Proctor, in order to a proper affidavit being prepared by him with reference thereto.

Declaration of Danish Consul.

SUR la demande de qui de droit je déclare conformément à la vérité que M. Schröder Lund, Consul de Sa Majesté le Roi de Danemark à Memel, m'a fait, en date du 12 Mai, A.C., la communication suivante:—

"Le Consul Britannique de cette place vient d'être invité par le chef ici présent d'un croiseur Anglais, à porter à la connaissance du public qu'à compter du 15 Mai A.C. les ports Russes seront tenus dans l'état de blocus le plus strict, et que tout navire, qui, après ce terme, quittera, chargé en entier ou en partie, un port Russe, sera capturé et envoyé en Angleterre."

Cette communication m'est parvenue le 14 du même mois.

Depuis le 15 Mai, jour où le susdit blocus fut notifié, jusqu'au $\frac{1}{13}$ Juin inclusivement, sont entrés dans ce port vingt-quatre navires, dont un grand nombre ont déclaré qu'ils n'ont pas pu, malgré leurs efforts, decouvrir de croiseurs ennemis qui eussent pu leur donner des renseignements exacts sur la question, s'il leur était encore toujours permis d'entrer dans notre port, et de le quitter sans détriment, ce qui les a persuadé de la non-existence du blocus, et que par conséquent ils n'ont pas eu l'intention de rompre le blocus.

Après qu'on avait appris plus tard que des navires, partis d'ici avec chargement, ont été capturés, les navires encore situés dans le port n'ont pas osé mettre à la voile et sur leur demande de pouvoir le faire, le memorandum ci-joint, dont l'original est déposé chez moi, leur a été communiqué, plus tard une nouvelle publication du Capitaine Heathcote est émanée, selon laquelle le terme pour quitter le port a été fixé jusqu'au 10 Août A.C.

Contract at Berlin for wire for Russian telegraph.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 29th September last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Berlin, reporting that a Russian Colonel had entered into a contract with a firm in that town for the delivery within a certain time of a large quantity of wire, intended for the completion of the electric telegraph between Moscow and Odessa, and that it is supposed that a portion of this contract is about to be completed in England.

To be manufactured in England.

Mr. Hammond was likewise pleased to transmit to me a letter which has been addressed to the Foreign Office by direction of the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, informing your Lordship that the list of articles the exportation of which is prohibited does not include wire, and that the exportation thereof cannot be prevented; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship whether Her Majesty's Government is able to stop the exportation of the wire in question.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—xport to Prussia legal.

That I am not aware of any means by which the exportation of the wire in question from Great Britain to Prussia can be legally prevented, at all events without more specific information.

A strong representation to the Prussian Government on the subject may perhaps have the effect of preventing, or at least delaying, the intended transmission of the particular wire in question through Prussia.

Wire may be seized as enemy's property.

If correct information can be procured as to the place of its manufacture here and the mode of its intended transmission, means may possibly be found of legally impeding, if not preventing, the transaction by seizing the particular wire, or some portion thereof, as enemy's property; but, in order to justify this, there must be some reasonable amount of proof that this is the fact.

Purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects in neutral ports. Use of British flag before registration.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th September last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note, dated September 25, 1854, from Count Walewski, inquiring what view is taken by Her Majesty's Government of the questions of the purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects in neutral ports, of the navigation of those vessels under the British flag previously to their being admitted by registration to the privileges of British ships, and of the validity of any contract made under the sanction of Consuls of hostile Powers between their subjects and the subjects of the enemy; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship, at my early convenience, my opinion upon this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That although the purchase of enemy's ships by neutrals during war was always tolerated by British Prize Courts, yet that before the Statute 12 & 13 Vict., cap. 29, foreign vessels could not even in peace, if purchased by British subjects, be registered as British ships. All registered British ships were before that Statute necessarily "British built."

Purchase legal.

The point in question, therefore, now arises for the first time, and I incline to the opinion that a British subject may lawfully purchase a Russian ship in a neutral port, and obtain for her a British register. If such a ship were captured, I apprehend that a British Prize Court must restore her to the British claimant; she could not be considered boná fide enemy's property, and her purchaser could not, in my opinion, be considered as "trading with the enemy" so as to subject his ship to condemnation, even if, after the Order in Council of the 15th May, trading with the enemy is a legal offence (which is at least doubtful).

Prize Court does not take notice of infractions of English Statute Law.

The purchaser of the particular ship, the "British Lion," may possibly have violated the English municipal law in this particular case as by "exercising the privileges of a British ship before registration," contrary to 8 & 9 Vict., cap. 89, sec. 4. This must depend upon the particular facts of this and of every other similar case, and is a question exclusively of English and not of international law, upon which the Customs Department might be applied to for information. I may add that the Prize Court of Admiralty has recently decided (in the case of the "Ocean's Bride") that it is not bound to take notice of infractions of the English Statute Law as to registration of British ships even if committed by British claimants, to whom it may, nevertheless, restore a British ship, leaving such infractions to be otherwise dealt with.

I regret that, from the novelty of the case, I am not able to give your Lordship a more explicit opinion, and if the matter proceeds further, I should greatly desire the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, but I did not wish to delay the matter at present by requiring such assistance.

It may be proper to inform Count Walewski that Her Majesty's Government will, on any cases of the British flag being illegally used within British jurisdiction, make every effort in their power to punish the wrong-doers, but that each of such cases must depend upon the construction which the British Courts may put upon the facts of such case and the law applicable to those facts; and it should be distinctly understood that this is a question in which Her Majesty's Government have little or no discretion or power. They can only institute, or refrain from instituting, legal proceedings in each or any case; they cannot alter the law or interfere with its interpretation by the Tribunals.

The sanction of the British Consul would not be considered by British Courts as sufficient to render any such contracts valid. It would be, of course, a circumstance in favour of the contract, but not by any means decisive. The sanction of any foreign Consul would be immaterial.

"Ostsee" restored by Prize Court.

Claim of owners for costs.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, October 14, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th October instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from M. Kreeft, Mecklenburg Consul-General in this country, remonstrating against that portion of the decision of the Court of Admiralty in the case of the "Ostsee," captured for an alleged breach of blockade, which decides against the claims of the owners to costs; Mr. Hammond was likewise pleased to transmit to me the former papers on the subject of this capture, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship any information which I might possess as to the grounds on which the Court of Admiralty has decided not to grant costs against the captors.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have procured from the Queen's Proctor, and herewith transmit, a shorthand writer's report of the precise expressions used by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty when he refused costs and damages in the case of the "Ostsee." I have further to observe that there were other circumstances in the case which may not improbably have influenced his decision, although not mentioned in his Judgment; but as the case has been appealed by the claimants, and as these circumstances will be again discussed before the Court of Appeal, I refrain from entering upon them at present; indeed, their bearing on the case could hardly be made intelligible without appending all the papers and troubling your Lordship with a legal discussion of the case at considerable length. I may, perhaps, be permitted to remark upon what appears to me the inconsistent course pursued by the claimants and by M. Kreeft. Whilst the claimants are appealing and endeavouring to get judgment reversed and the captors legally condemned in costs and damages, M. Kreeft is at the same time officially requesting compensation from Her Majesty's Government as if the Judgment (appealed against) were final, or as if Her Majesty's Government were responsible for it; any answer he may receive will probably be communicated to the claimants and used by them (if possible) in their appeal.

I may add that as soon as the case of this ship was laid before me by the Queen's Proctor, and before it was brought to a hearing, I advised that an offer should be at once made to the claimants to restore her on payment of the captors' expenses; this offer the claimants rejected, and thereby considerably increased those costs and expenses which they nevertheless sought, and are still seeking to compel the captors to pay. This was mentioned by me to the Court at the hearing, and even then I did not offer any opposition, but consented to her being restored, and this appears to have had some effect on its decision, which, at all events, is the decision of a competent Court, and for which, even if erroneous (which I do not consider it to be), Her Majesty's Government cannot fairly be held responsible to the Government of Mecklenburg.

On the whole I would venture to suggest that it may be sufficient to inform M. Kreeft that the claimants having appealed from the decision of the Judge of the Admiralty, Her Majesty's Government cannot entertain the question, but must leave it to the decision of the Court of Appeal.

Admiralty Prize Court, August 19, 1854.

THE "OSTSEE."

Judgment delivered by Dr. Lushington.

Judgment.

DURING the seventeen years that Lord Stowell presided in this Court, and administered the Law of Nations with regard to war, I believe that out of the many thousands of ships and cargoes brought before him he condemned the captors in only about ten or a dozen cases in costs and damages—not one in a thousand; and Lord Stowell also, as I right well remember, laid it down that he would not condemn the captors in costs and damages upon evidence given before him without giving them the opportunity of justifying their conduct, and stating, if they thought fit, the grounds on which they made the capture. In my own recollection there are only three cases of restitution with costs and damages. I am well aware that where a seizure has been made without ostensible cause or reason, justice requires that the persons making the seizure shall make good to the party the loss that may be occasioned by the capture, but I am also of opinion that this is the extremity of the Law of Nations which ought not to be adopted, except in cases which imperatively require the Court so to do. Without venturing any opinion as to what may be the duty of the Court in cases that may come before it, I think, looking at the confusion that has arisen respecting blockade, and looking at the difficulty which captains of Her Majesty's vessels will have in forming their own opinion, and seeing that consent has been given for the restitution of the ship and cargo, I think I should be going too far in condemning the captors in costs and damages, and I decline so to do.

Purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects in neutral ports.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, October 14, 1854.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th October instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 28th September last, relative to questions put by the French Ambassador in regard to the purchase of Russian vessels by British subjects in neutral ports, he was directed to transmit to me a further note from Count Walewski relative to the same case, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon the right of Her Majesty's Government to interfere in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That with reference to the special circumstances relating to the ship "British Lion," which Count Walewski states as being the result "des informations recueillies" since the 25th September, I beg to suggest that these circumstances should be immediately communicated to the Customs Department, and their prompt and vigilant attention requested to the case; and that such Department should be requested to cause this ship to be detained and legal proceedings to be instituted against her if possible.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th October, stating that, with reference to my report of the 28th September,* upon the claim of Messrs. Lewin, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a letter from the Admiralty, dated the 2nd October, inclosing Rear-Admiral Plumridge's reports respecting the destruction of property at Uleaborg by the squadron under his command, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion what answer should be returned to the letter of Messrs. Hanoverian vessel captured for breach of blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Hanoverian Minister at this Court, stating the grounds on which the Hanoverian Government think that the Hanoverian ship "Reinhard," captured for an alleged breach of blockade in the Baltic, should be liberated, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot release on ex parte statement. Must await decision of Prize Court.

That I am informed by the Queen's Proctor that on the 5th October he was instructed by the Admiralty to take proceedings against this ship, which he has done. The witnesses are about to be examined, and the ship's papers to be translated as usual in such cases. Until this is done (which may occupy about fifteen days) and the result laid before me, it is impossible for me to form any opinion at all upon the case. As soon as I can see the papers I will (as I did in the "Ostsee") direct the Queen's Proctor to offer to restore the ship upon proper terms, if I consider it a proper case for such an offer. Otherwise, it will come on in regular course before the Prize Court, and be there decided, unless I should in the meantime be favoured with any special instructions from your Lordship on the matter.

It is to be observed that Count Kielmansegge's application was not made until after proceedings had been instituted, and that it is only in very special cases that Her Government can be advised to abandon a suit upon the ex parte statement of those interested in the result, even when made through their Government.

Count Kielmansegge can, I apprehend, only derive his information in this matter from the claimant.

British subjects remaining in Russia, employed as Professors of Arts and Sciences.

WE beg to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a letter from Mrs. Mary Berg, requesting to be informed whether Englishmen remaining in the Russian service lose their rights as British subjects, and further stating that he (Mr. Hammond) was to request that we would take this paper into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the applicant.

In obedience to your Lordship's desire we beg to state that the answer which we recommend should be returned is as follows:—

No offence against English law. But high treason if in army or navy.

If a British subject, after a declaration of war by his Sovereign, remains in the military, naval, or political service of the country with which war is so declared, he will be guilty of the crime of adhering to the Queen's enemies, and may incur the penalties of high treason. But civilized nations do not make war against literature or science, nor do they desire to prevent their progress, even in the country of an enemy, and they regard those who are engaged in the advancement of learning, whatever may be the country in which they labour, as employed for the general benefit of mankind.

A British subject, therefore, who, at the commencement of the present war, was resident as a Professor of Art, Literature, or Science in a Russian University (not being a mere naval or military school) will not, by remaining in his occupation, be guilty of any offence against English law, and certainly will not on his return to this country be deprived of any of the rights or privileges of a British subject.

Fictitious sales of Russian vessels to Lubeck citizens.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th October, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch received from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Hamburgh, inclosing copies of letters from Her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Lubeck as to the fictitious sale of two Russian vessels to Lubeck citizens, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the same into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, inasmuch as nothing is stated as to the (supposed) dates of these transfers of ships from Russian to neutral flags, I cannot at once recommend their being captured, I can only suggest that the particulars should be communicated to the Admiralty, the Customs, and (as to the "Dufvan") to Her Majesty's Consul at Stockholm.

May be captured if transferred after war was imminent.

If the transfer of the ownership from Russians to neutrals took place after war was known to be imminent (say in or since March), each particular vessel so transferred (to whatever flag or in whatever port) may, as a general rule, if at sea, be captured, and, if in a British port, be seized with a fair prospect of condemnation ensuing, but not otherwise, excepting under special circumstances. It is much to be desired that Her Majesty's Consuls should send full information of all such cases, of which there have been a great many in Baltic ports. They should, if possible, specify the supposed date of the transfer as nearly as may be practicable, and perhaps communicate with any of Her Majesty's ships which may be likely to meet with the vessels in question.

Fictitious sale of Greek vessels to Ionian subjects

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th October, stating that, with reference to the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown of the 16th July last,* relative to the course to be pursued by the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands in regard to the fictitious sale of certain Greek vessels to Ionian subjects, he was directed to transmit to me a further letter from the War Department upon the same subject, and that, as it appears to your Lordship to be very desirable that Sir Henry Ward should act in accordance with the opinion of the Procurator-General of the Ionian Islands, Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would state to your Lordship whether I see any objection to the course proposed by the Duke of Newcastle.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Lord High Commissioner's discretionary power of granting passes.

That I do not see any objection to the course proposed by the Duke of Newcastle, viz., to direct Sir Henry Ward to continue, under existing circumstances, to exercise discretionary power of granting passes which he has lately done. The Law Officers' Report of the 24th July last stated that he had that discretionary power, the only question is as to the particular circumstances under which it should be exercised, and this power Sir Henry Ward will no doubt exercise with proper caution under the advice of the Procurator-General, having received information of the Law Officers' opinion.

* Query 24th July. See No. 155.

I may add that it might possibly be found more expedient to alter the Ionian laws, which afford such facilities for fraud in the assumption of Ionian nationality, than to impose on the Lord High Commissioner the somewhat critical and invidious duty of refusing sanitary papers to vessels bearing the Ionian flag and papers, (whose crews are quite healthy) because he may suspect their nationality, and that, if the refusal of such sanitary papers is the only check upon palpable frauds habitually practised by foreigners in assuming the Ionian flag, such a state of things appears urgently to require some local legislative enactment.

My Lord,

Dutch vessels detained off Sulina, and afterwards released.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th October, stating that, with reference to my reports of the 29th July, 16th August, and 12th October,* upon the case of the two merchant vessels "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," detained off Sulina by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to me, together with the former correspondence which has taken place upon this subject, a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, claiming, on the part of his Government, compensation for the losses sustained by the captains of the above-mentioned vessels in consequence of their detention.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's note, together with the previous papers relating to this case, into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience whether the facts stated in Baron Bentinck's note correspond with those upon which I reported in my letter of 12th October, my opinion that the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida" should be restored on condition of their owners making no further claims respecting them, or whether the facts now stated would entitle the owners to compensation as well as to the restoration of the vessels.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, adverting to my reports of 16th August and 12th October, I perceive that I have probably in my report of the 12th October misapprehended the precise condition of these two vessels, which, I now perceive from Admiral Dundas' letter of the 29th June (No. 4 in Lord Stratford's No. 360) were not finally captured, but appear to have been released after some detention by his orders. Other vessels appear to have been captured for breaking the blockade of the Danube, the mode as to dealing with which cases I reported on the 16th August, and when I reported on this case on the 12th October, I was under the erroneous impression that these two Dutch vessels had been also captured, and were still detained with the other prizes at Constantinople, I therefore suggested their being "restored."

As I now understand the facts, they were released by Admiral Dundas, but Baron Bentinck, on behalf of the Netherlands Government, now demands compensation for their detention.

I beg to suggest that, before any definite answer is returned to Baron Bentinck's application, the attention of Admiral Dundas, or, at all events, of some of the officers immediately concerned in this particular transaction, should be directed to my report of the 29th July, in order that it may be ascertained that I have correctly assumed the facts to be as therein stated, and that such further remarks may be suggested in explanation or mitigation of the damages claimed as the circumstances may admit of.

Moderate compensation might be given.

My present impression is in accordance with my report of the 29th July, to the effect that the detention of these vessels was irregular, and that the owners may be fairly entitled, on the application of a friendly Government, to some moderate compensation, but chiefly, if not solely, by reason of their not having been released at Custange, but taken on to Baltschick, and this (as also other points in the case) may be capable of explanation by those conversant with the particular facts of the case, who may be able to furnish some further arguments against the right of the owners to be compensated.

---

* Nos. 159 and 200. Also No. 171 (?).

Had the vessels been sent before a Prize Court, and had their owners rejected an offer of "restoration without costs or damages," I am of opinion that the Court would not have decreed them any costs or damages, and this was my reason for suggesting such an offer (see my report as to the ship "Ostsee," October 14, 1854)* much, for instance, would, in my opinion, depend upon the answer which can be given to the question "Whether when these vessels sailed from Constantinople they had any and what reason to expect that a blockade of the Danube might or would be established before they could enter.

Russian vessels transferred to American citizens at neutral ports.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th October last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, inclosing opinions from the counsel to Her Majesty's Legation and from the United States' Attorney-General, relative to the transfer of Russian vessels to citizens of the United States in neutral ports, and to request that I would take these documents into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which might occur to me thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these documents into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I perceive that the United States' Government, by way of answer to Mr. Crampton's inquiries, simply incloses to him a copy of the opinion of the United States' Attorney-General.

This appears to be a somewhat inconvenient course. If Mr. Attorney-General Cushing's opinion is, under the circumstances, to be treated as the official answer of the United States to Mr. Crampton's inquiries, it may possibly require a somewhat lengthened and technical reply, which I abstain from attempting until furnished with further instructions from your Lordship to that effect.

As to what papers are necessary to constitute them American vessels.

Legal authorities.

In the meantime I would beg to observe that the second and third questions put by Mr. Crampton (although treated by the United States' Attorney-General as secondary questions) are, in fact, those of the utmost practical importance, and to these questions he really gives no answer at all in the last three or four pages of his opinion. He concludes by saying "the question of what particular documents shall be issued from the Treasury or State Department to a foreign-built ship lawfully owned by a citizen of the United States in the absence of any special legislation on the subject, seems to me a proper one for the consideration of the Executive and of Congress." Upon this subject Mr. Marcy's attention may perhaps be directed to the opinion of a former United States' Attorney-General. "The people of the United States seem to have contemplated the National Government as the sole and exclusive organ of intercourse with foreign nations. It ought, therefore, to be armed with power to satisfy all fair and proper demands which foreign nations may make on our justice and courtesy, or, in other words, with power to reciprocate with foreign nations the fulfilment of all the moral obligations, perfect and imperfect, which the law of nations devolves upon us as a nation. In this respect our system appears to be crippled and imperfect."—Opinions of the Attorneys-General of the United States, vol. 1 page 392. Her Majesty's Government asks "what are the requisite documents?" The United States' Attorney-General answers, in effect, "whatever the Executive and Congress may hereafter choose to require." Possibly it may be proper to point this out with all courtesy to Mr. Secretary Marcy, and to request further and more definite information from him. It may be remarked that numerous neutral States have already fully answered this as well as the other questions now put to the United States' Government, and have even supplied full and accurate lists, descriptions, and copies of the documents which all merchant vessels lawfully entitled to claim their nationality ought to have on board. This information is, for obvious reasons, much needed by belligerents from all neutral and friendly maritime States; it is asked for in the most candid and amicable spirit, but it is not furnished by Mr. Attorney-General Cushing, and Her Majesty's Government is still, in my opinion, much in want of it.

I may add (in confidence) that I strongly incline to the opinion that Mr. Carlisle is right and the Attorney-General wrong, as to the main points on which their opinions so entirely differ, particularly as to foreign-built vessels being entitled to United States' nationality as soon as purchased by United States' citizens abroad, and without registration or any United States' documents on board, and that if the Attorney-General's opinion is to be treated as the formal and official answer of the United States' Government, there are some other important points in it not immediately bearing on this question (especially as to the decisions of British Prize Courts not being in accordance with the universal law of nations) which may require serious notice, the more so because Mr. Attorney-General Cushing seems disposed to adopt views on this subject totally at variance with those entertained by Chief Justice Storey and Chancellor Kent, hitherto considered the highest authorities in the United States, and the whole tone of his opinion is not only somewhat controversial and unfriendly to Great Britain, but calculated to put forward and maintain a very vague and undefined right to cover with the United States' flag any vessels and cargoes in which United States' citizens may be interested, though not fairly entitled to it by international law. I beg to refer to my report of the 29th of May[*] (on Mr. Buchanan's note), and to repeat the observation therein made, that I suspect that there is some design in this opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, and to observe that the recent concession made by Her Majesty in favour of the flag as covering the cargo, makes it more than ever important to prevent the abuse of the United States' flag. It appears to me desirable to avoid all discussion with the United States' Government as to abstract, belligerent, and neutral rights, and principles of international or prize law, and to elicit, if possible, a practical answer to the plain question "What United States' ships' papers ought every United States' merchant vessel, by United States' law, to have on board, either in peace or war?"

I abstain from going further at present. I beg to refer to my report of the 13th October,[†] upon Count Walewski's application as to the purchase of Russian ships in the United States by British subjects, and to point out that it ought to be borne in mind that our own legislation and regulations on this subject would not be considered as very satisfactory by belligerents if Great Britain were a neutral. This state of things will, however, be remedied to a considerable extent on the 1st May, 1855, by Statute 17 and 18 Vict., cap. 104.—"The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854."

Difference of opinion between United States' Attorney-General and Counsel to Her Majesty's Legation.

In conclusion, I have only to observe that if the law of the United States be as stated by Mr. Carlisle, it must be satisfactory to belligerents, and appears, if vigilantly enforced, to be well calculated to prevent any fraudulent abuse of the United States' flag. If, on the contrary, it is as stated by Mr. Attorney-General Cushing, it is obviously open to every species of abuse and likely to involve the United States with the belligerent Powers.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, November 10, 1854.

Explanations. Dr. Deane's "Instructions" to Consuls.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of October 10, stating that he was directed to state to me that Mr. Consul Taylor will be instructed to endeavour to obtain the information respecting the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic suggested in my letter of October 5;[‡] but Mr. Hammond is to observe to me, with regard to my statement "that Dr. Deane has recently sent particular instructions to Mr. Taylor on that point," that Dr. Deane had no authority whatever to send any instructions to any of Her Majesty's servants under the Foreign Office, and that your Lordship would be glad to have an explanation of the grounds on which he felt himself authorized to do so.

Charge of negligence against Consuls in Baltic.

Mr. Hammond is pleased at the same time to state to me that, with reference to that passage in my Report in which I said "that Her Majesty's Consular Officers in the Baltic are, from commercial connections and habits, not so diligent or effective in this matter as could be wished," your Lordship cannot permit the general charge of negligence against the whole of the Consuls in the Baltic, brought by the Legal Adviser of the Foreign Office, to pass unnoticed, and that your Lordship would be obliged to me for specific and detailed information respecting each Consul who has failed in the performance of his duty.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That, with reference to that portion of my Report which alludes to Dr. Deane as having recently "sent instructions on this point," I have the honour to state that Dr. Deane having been sent out to the Baltic by the Admiralty (as I understand), and at the suggestion of the Queen's Proctor, expressly to collect legal evidence to be used in the Prize Court on behalf of the Crown as to the existence and knowledge of the blockade of Russian ports in the various neutral ports in the Baltic, was (I believe upon my application) assisted by a "Circular" sent from the Foreign Office to the Consuls to afford him assistance, which they did. He did not see Mr. Taylor, and therefore necessarily wrote to him a letter containing detailed "instructions" (not in the official, but strictly in the legal, sense of the word) as to the shape and contents of the Consular certificate, or affidavit, or evidence which it was hoped that Mr. Taylor could supply.

I believe that Dr. Deane did not himself use the word "instructions," which was mine, and is that habitually used by all lawyers; as, for instance, "I have sent him instructions for his affidavit," "I am instructed to state, &c." I did this without any idea of thereby suggesting that Dr. Deane (who is not in Her Majesty's service) had assumed or was entitled to assume the slightest official authority over Mr. Taylor, or to send him or any other of Her Majesty's servants acting under the Foreign Office any other than legal instructions on this particular subject. I have had but little official experience, but I well know Dr. Deane had no such authority.

In corroboration of this explanation I beg to annex a note I wrote to Dr. Deane for explanation on this point, together with his reply and an inclosure. I shall anxiously hope for some intimation from your Lordship that Dr. Deane, at least, is free from blame in a matter in which he has diligently and successfully exerted himself, and in which I venture to submit that he only did what was actually necessary in "instructing" Consuls how to procure and in what shape to send legal evidence, which in any other shape would have been useless; he did not himself use the objectionable word. I stated in my Report what I conceived to be the substance of what he told me on his return.

I beg, moreover, distinctly to state that Dr. Deane was not sent out or selected or recommended by me; that I never saw or wrote to or heard from him before he went or during his absence.

When I was told by the Queen's Proctor that he should suggest to the Admiralty the sending Dr. Deane, I merely expressed my approval. If I have done wrong in using the word "instructions" in this matter, I have most respectfully to express my regret for it. In the great pressure of business I may often use an inaccurate expression, but I own that I cannot at present see my error in this particular instance.

I now proceed, with much reluctance, but in obedience to your Lordship's distinct and official instructions, to lay before your Lordship, as well as I can, the specific and detailed information which induced me to form and express the opinion that "Her Majesty's Consular Officers in the Baltic are not, from commercial connections and habits, so diligent and effective in this matter as could be wished." This expression your Lordship considers to amount to a general charge of negligence against the whole of the Consuls in the Baltic.

I beg to state distinctly that I did not and do not mean to impute or to insinuate against any of these gentlemen that they are actuated by any improper motives whatsoever. What I alluded to by the words "commercial habits and connections" was that, from the long duration of peace, and from some of their number being merchants, I considered that they had acquired the habit of facilitating, rather than impeding, all commercial transactions, and they seemed hardly sufficiently alive to the legal effects and consequences of war. As an illustration of my meaning, I would refer to my Report of April 6, 1854,[*] on Mr. Michele's conduct in relation to an application forwarded by him relating to a proposed trading with the enemy, by which it will be seen that Her Majesty's Consul at St. Petersburgh had no idea of there being any impropriety in trading with the enemy during war.

I proceed to state the reasons which have produced upon my mind the impression of their being not so diligent or effective as could be wished. I am not in a position to do more than this, or to furnish "specific and detailed information respecting each Consul who has failed in the performance of his duty." I alluded rather to their not having done all they might have done than to specific charges against individuals, which I have no intention to make, and I only mention particular names and facts in order to afford your Lordship the means of judging whether my opinion is or is not well founded.

I may perhaps be permitted to observe that the duties devolving upon the British Consuls in the Baltic ports on the war becoming imminent, and on its actual occurrence, were in my opinion widely different from those discharged by them during the recent forty years' peace.

Consuls should have given information as to evasion of belligerent rights, &c.

I presume that they must have received some special instructions in reference thereto; if none such were issued, it is not to be wondered at that they did not always understand what they were to do or not to do; but their sense of duty and general intelligence and experience would have been a sufficient guide to them in all cases of a very obvious and palpable aspect, and I presume that amongst their most important duties would be that of obtaining and conveying to your Lordship early and detailed information as to all attempts by neutrals to evade Her Majesty's belligerent rights, especially by fictitious sales and changes of flag, attempts to break or elude blockade, and generally in all matters connected with trade and shipping.

Fictitious sales, &c.

No sooner was war imminent than every effort was made to shield Russian ships from capture by the help of simulated papers and fictitious sales to pretended neutral owners, so as to "cover" these vessels by the fraudulent assumption of neutral flags. This system was resorted to in anticipation of blockade especially, and was closely connected with it. Neutral ships must receive actual notice of a blockade before they can be captured for breaking it, and if they can successfuly break it, and finish that particular voyage, they cannot be afterwards captured for breaking such blockade. Neutral ships even in a blockaded port are allowed free exit, and their cargoes laden before blockade are respected. There was a sudden demand for neutral ships in all Russian ports, and every device was resorted to to "manufacture" Russian ships into neutrals, so as to supply this demand. These simulated sales I have strong reason to believe to have been very numerous. At least nine of such cases have come before the Prize Court, the vessels having been actually seized in British ports.[*] No less than four[†] are claimed by one gentleman, Mr. Sorensen, born and bred in Russia, the son of the Danish Consul at Libau, but claiming to be a Dane.[‡] A much larger number have either not come into British ports, or have escaped detection and seizure whilst there.

A change of the Russian flag to a neutral flag on the eve of or during war must always attract general notice in any port in which it may happen, and is a matter, I humbly conceive, particularly proper for the vigilant attention and special communication to your Lordship on the part of all British Consuls. Some of them evidently so consider it, and have, on more than one occasion, sent specific information of such cases, especially the Consul at Lubeck and Colonel Hodges, as also Mr. McBean, at Leghorn, but in none of these nine cases of ships seized here for simulated sales, with one exception (the "Christine") have the Consuls sent any information at all, that I am aware of; none such has reached the Admiralty Proctor in any of those cases, to whom it would be naturally communicated. The absence of information in so many cases first impressed me with the idea that greater vigilance might have been used.

Many Baltic merchants at different ports were interested in each of these vessels and in their cargoes; the vessels were generally well known in the Baltic; each touched at one or more Baltic ports or passed the Sound, duly reporting themselves at Elisnore shortly before and shortly after their pretended change of flag, and the existence of a regular system of fraudulent transfer must have been notorious throughout the Baltic. The Danish flag was generally used, often without the vessel ever having visited a Danish port, and the scheme was carried on with the assistance of several agents and correspondents at different ports.

British Consular certificates granted.

In no less than four[§] out of these nine cases, British Consular certificates have been found on board, showing, at all events, that Mr. Consul Sannoby,[‖] of Libau, so far from sending any information, was induced to lend his sanction to such transactions, and to issue official documents in connection therewith.[¶] The practical effect of such certificates, or of any similar document in an official form from a British Consul, would be in most cases to secure perfect impunity to all concerned and to carry out the fraud. Most naval officers, for instance, would shrink from the responsibility of capturing a neutral vessel with a British Consular certificate amongst her papers; and such documents are always strongly relied upon by claimants in proof and argument in the Prize Court.

The discovery of such certificates on board so large a proportion of the vessels seized for simulated sale confirmed my impression of want of vigilance on the part of Consuls, and I beg to append an extract from the Judgment of the High Court of Admiralty as to one of such certificates.* Copies of all the papers in each case are with the Admiralty Proctor. The originals are in the Admiralty Registry.

With respect to the question of the knowledge of the blockade of Riga (especially), which some of these very vessels in their neutral disguise succeeded in breaking, the main point on which information has been, and still is wanted is, "when and how was it first known at that Riga was blockaded?"

Date when blockade of Riga was known.

It is obvious from the following facts and dates that the existence of a blockade of several ports, especially Riga, was known in the Baltic ports by the end of April or early in May, and long before the "Gazette" notice of it on June 16. The blockade of Riga was established on the 17th April, and constantly thereafter maintained. More than 150 vessels were warned off by the blockading force. Most of such vessels must have put into various Baltic ports or passed through the Sound, stopping and reporting themselves at Elsinore. By this or other means a clear knowledge of the existence of the blockade soon spread rapidly by means of telegraphs, newspapers, and commercial advices, and was diffused all over the Baltic in a very short time; this is quite in accordance with experience, which shows how quickly such important commercial intelligence is always made known to all interested, and it is now clearly established by legal proof procured by means of Dr. Deane's exertions. Colonel Lloyd Hodges, in an affidavit sworn at Hamburgh, October 4, deposes that the blockade of Libau and the Gulf of Riga "were matters of public notoriety in Hamburgh and Bremen as early as the end of April; that such blockades were referred to in the journals published daily in Hamburgh, Lubeck, Bremen, the ports of the Duchies of Holstein and Schleswig, Mecklenburgh Schwerin, Prussia, and other ports of the Baltic, and generally throughout Germany amongst ship-owners, masters of vessels, and others connected with shipping and trade at the sea-ports of the north of Europe."

This is corroborated by newspapers forwarded by him; for instance, by a Hamburgh newspaper of the 22nd April, containing, as news from Memel of the 19th April, an announcement of some of the blockading squadron being then on the spot, and by a Hamburgh newspaper of the 27th April, which speaks of the blockade as then existing.

The question upon which information from Mr. Taylor and from other Consuls was and still is desired, is obviously not when it was officially notified by the British authorities or the neutral Governments, but when and how merchants generally first heard and knew it. I apprehend that they did know it by the end of April at latest all over the Baltic, according to Colonel Hodges.

It is with regard to this state of facts that I did not consider Mr. Taylor's despatch to your Lordship of the 19th September as very satisfactory. I have since received a copy of his despatch of 18th October, which calls for no special remark.

I cannot consider that the accompanying affidavit, which is all the information, I presume, that can be obtained from Mr. Larlham, at Elsinore, on the same point, is more satisfactory than Mr. Taylor's despatch of the 19th September.

If (as Colonel Lloyd Hodges proves) the blockade was well known all over the Baltic, especially in the ports of Schleswig and Holstein, by the end of April; if it then was publicly notorious at Hamburgh, and published in the Hamburgh newspapers of the 22nd and 27th April, I cannot persuade myself that the mercantile community at Copenhagen and Elsinore remained ignorant of it until June, and that no notice of it appeared in the Danish newspapers, or was circulated amongst Danish merchants by commercial "advices," or by ships putting into Danish ports.

I have strong reasons for believing that Danish ships were warned off from Russian blockaded ports by Her Majesty's ships and actually put into Danish ports before the middle of May. I am quite aware of the extreme reluctance (adverted to by Mr. Taylor) which is shown by foreign merchants and by foreign Governments to admit anything on this subject. It is this very reluctance which rendered it necessary for the Crown to call upon the Consuls for their active exertions in this matter; but considering the rapid and regular communication between various Danish ports (e. g., Altona and Flensburg) and such places as Hamburgh, I cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that many of the Baltic merchants in London are in a better position as to information on this point from Denmark than the Crown is even at the present moment, although that condition is improved since my report of the 5th October; and it was with reference to the state of things then existing that I used the term "not very satisfactory," having observed that Mr. Taylor, in his first despatch of the 19th September confined himself to the various official notifications, and did not even state that he had attempted to obtain the necessary information from merchants, by searching files of newspapers, or by any similar means.

I am now aware of some valuable information having been recently received, especially from Her Majesty's Consular Officers at Lubeck and Flensburgh (in consequence of Dr. Deane's exertions) which tends to corroborate Colonel Hodges' statement that the blockade was known to exist by the end of April, but no such information had been received by me from any Consular authority in the Baltic when I addressed to your Lordship my report of the 5th October.

Again, as to the date at which it was known at Riga itself that the port was blockaded, bearing in mind that it was so at least from the 17th April;* that the blockading squadron was occasionally seen from Riga itself, and frequently from the neighbouring Russian coast, and that Captain Key's public notification was publicly advertised by Her Majesty's Consul at Memel on the 17th, 18th, and 19th May, and published in a Stettin newspaper of 20th May, and that letters sent by the post from Memel to Riga arrive there on the next day but one, it must be obvious that the despatch of Mr. Plaw (from Dantzig) to your Lordship of September 2, and that of Mr. Brockmann (from Koningberg) of August 14, purporting to convey the best information they could obtain from Riga on this point, conveyed only very imperfect and erroneous information. I do not mean to say that this is to be imputed to them as a serious fault, because they were (and doubtless designedly) misinformed by their Riga correspondents; but I must observe that they do not in their despatches point out that this information was incorrect or even suspicious, and that the fact must have been otherwise, of which a very little consideration would nevertheless have convinced them. I am of opinion that no merchant of ordinary ability would have believed such information from a Riga correspondent under the existing circumstances.

I have thus endeavoured, in compliance with your Lordship's instructions, to put your Lordship in possession of the principal facts upon which I have formed the impression of some want of diligence and efficiency on the part of the Consuls in the Baltic in these matters. Having formed that impression, I conceived it to be my official duty to convey it to your Lordship, more especially because of my being particularly charged with the protection of the interest of the Crown in prizes, and acting as counsel to the Crown in almost all such cases in the Prize Court, I enjoy peculiar opportunities of information. I am well aware of the various powerful interests arrayed against the Crown in neutral ports, and of the great difficulties Consuls have to encounter in discharging their duty in this respect; but having observed that in four cases out of nine at least one British Consul had allowed his vigilance to be so far eluded as to furnish (after war had broken out) official documents which were intended to be used, and were used, against the Crown, and also that the Crown, instead of having the best information, was somewhat worse informed as to matters of commercial interest and notoriety than many private merchants, I addressed to your Lordship the particular observations now in question in my report of October 5, which observations I most respectfully submit were not unjustifiable under all the circumstances of the case.

Blockades: Notices of, communicated to Foreign Ministers.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th instant, stating that, by agreement with the French Government, notice has been given by letter to Foreign Ministers in London and Paris of the institutions of blockades by the allied forces, inclosing to them at the same time the notifications published respectively in the "London Gazette" or the "Moniteur."

Lord Wodehouse further states that he is directed by your Lordship to request that I would report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion whether, on the publication in the "London Gazette" of a notice that a blockade has ceased, it is equally necessary that a letter should be addressed to foreign Ministers for the information of their Governments.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Raising of blockades to be equally so communicated.

That I am of opinion that the raising of a blockade should be notified in the same manner and form as its institution may have been notified, and that consequently it appears to me to be proper that such a letter as suggested should be addressed to foreign Ministers on the publication in the "London Gazette" of a notice that a blockade has ceased.

Dutch vessel building at Libau, contracted for in 1853.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, stating the circumstances under which Mr. Hogendyk, a Dutchman, contracted, in October 1853, with a ship-builder at Libau, for the construction of a merchant schooner, and actually paid five-eighths of the purchase-money.

That Mr. Hogendyk considering the vessel as his own property, is stated to have applied to the Admiralty for permission to take her out of the Porte of Libau, and to have been informed, in reply, that his request would not be granted.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to add that Baron Bentinck now requests that Her Majesty's Government will reconsider their decision on this matter, and will allow Mr. Hogendyk to bring his vessel away from Libau.

And Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take this case into consideration, and, at my earliest convenience, report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Baron Bentinck.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot be brought out of port of Libau.

That Baron Bentinck should be informed that Her Majesty's Government must decline to give any special permission in favour of Mr. Hogendyk, or in regard to the vessel in question which is being built at Libau.

Hanoverian ship "Reinhard" before Admiralty Court.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 9th November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying note from Count Kielmansegge, Hanoverian Minister at this Court, stating that the case of the Hanoverian ship "Reinhard," now before the Admiralty Courts, has reached that state in which Her Majesty's Government will be able to decide as to the propriety of liberating that vessel at once. Lord Wodehouse also states that he is further directed to transmit to me the former correspondence on this subject, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Should be left to decision of Prize Court.

That having perused the depositions and ship's papers in the case of the "Reinhard," I am of opinion that upon the whole it is not a case by any means favourable to the bona fides of the claimants, or one in which the Crown ought to forego its rights, and I am of opinion that the case should be left to the decision of the Prize Court. I do not consider it necessary, until further instructed to this effect by your Lordship, to state the grounds upon which I have arrived at this conclusion, which I could not do without referring at considerable length to the facts of the case and the law applicable to those facts.

I observe that Count Kielmansegge, in his communication to your Lordship of the 4th November, refers to and incloses a statement which he describes as that of the legal adviser of the "Reinhard." I beg to observe that this gentleman is a proctor, occupying much the same position in the Court of Admiralty as an attorney in a Court of Law, or a solicitor in a Court of Equity, and that no opinion of any advocate favourable to the case of the claimant is annexed or referred; it may be not unfairly inferred that no such could be obtained. However this may be, a proctor's statement of his views of his own client's case appears to me to be a document with which a foreign Minister need scarcely trouble your Lordship.

Count Kielmansegge, in the same communication, also alludes to "the papers for the defence handed into the Court of Admiralty, namely, an important affidavit of the sworn ship's brokers, and the Bill Brief of the ship 'Reinhard.'" I beg to state distinctly that this description, if I am rightly informed by Her Majesty's Procurator-General, is not correct. No such papers have been handed in to the Court or are before it, so far as I can ascertain. In order to ascertain the truth as to such papers, Her Majesty's Procurator-General has, by my desire, applied to the proctor for the claimants, Mr. Rothery, for these papers, and has informed me that Mr. Rothery states that he has no knowledge whatsoever of them.

Under these peculiar circumstances, I would suggest that this part of the case should be closely followed up in whatever manner may seem fit to your Lordship. Perhaps Count Kielmansegge's attention should be invited to this point, and he should be requested forthwith to furnish copies of them to your Lordship, and to explain when and by whom they were "handed to the Court of Admiralty." These documents may be of great importance to the decision of the case, and it will be desirable to sift this matter to the bottom, and to ascertain whether they had been seen by Count Kielmansegge when he wrote to your Lordship, or who had informed him that they were before the Court, and what are the real facts in regard to them. I may perhaps usefully explain that the "Bill Brief" is the document nearly answering to the British Certificate of Registry, containing the dimensions and description of the vessel and her owners' names. It is the most important document relating to a Hanoverian ship as establishing her nationality; it is expressly required by the Hanoverian Royal Decree of 1840 to be carried by all Hanoverian vessels, and this document is wanting; it is not with the other ship's papers of the "Reinhard." Its absence, coupled with the fact that the "Reinhard" was at one time navigated under Russian colours and had Russian colours on board when captured, are amongst the causes of suspicion against her. It may be of importance to find out how and when Count Kielmansegge first saw the "Bill Brief" of the "Reinhard," in whose hands it then was, and now is; how it came into such hands, and why it was not on board with her other ship's papers, as expressly required by the Hanoverian law.

Danish Circular. Vessels of belligerents who have become Danish subjects since war began, not entitled to Danish protection.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd of November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, inclosing a Circular issued by the Danish Government to its authorities informing them that vessels belonging to the subjects of belligerent Powers who have become citizens of Denmark subsequently to the commencement of the war will have no claim to Danish protection; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the "Circular" in question is so far satisfactory as that it indicates some desire on the part of the Danish Government to check the frequent abuses of the Danish flag which have been committed during the present war. Instances of such abuses have been far more frequent under the Danish flag than under all other flags together.

Similar to Ordinance of 1803.

Adverting, however, to the provisions of Article III of the Danish Ordinance of May 4, 1803:—"Pour obtenir le certificat ordonné par l'article précédent, il faut être notre sujet, né dans nos Etats, ou avoir acquis, avant le commencement des hostilités entre quelques Etats maritimes de l'Europe la jouissance complète de tous les droits de sujet domicilié, soit de nos pays, soit de quelqu'autre Etat neutre. Le propriétaire du navire, pour lequel on demande le certificat, devra, dans tous les cas, résider dans quelque endroit de nos Royaumes ou des pays à nous appartenants."

Hitherto violated.

The Circular would seem to have been rendered necessary only by reason of the frequent violations of that Ordinance, which the Danish Government must be well aware have occurred with the sanction or connivance of the Danish authorities during the present war. It may appear to your Lordship proper to inquire of the Danish Government what course it proposes to adopt with reference to those persons who have actually obtained Danish documents for Russian ships without being Danish subjects by birth or by allegiance before the war, contrary to the spirit and terms of the Ordinance and the Circular.

Some of such cases have been and are still before the High Court of Admiralty, in which the claimants are doing their utmost to maintain their right to Danish nationality in direct contravention of the Ordinance and of the Circular, and are insisting upon Danish official documents as legally clothing them and their ships with Darnish nationality, which document, as it now appears, must have been improperly issued to them by Danish authority, and which may, nevertheless, be successfully used against or (legally speaking) "in fraud of" Her Majesty's belligerent rights.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, November 22, 1854.

Dates when blockade of Russian Baltic ports was known at Copenhagen.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch which has been received from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, reporting on the period when the blockade of Russian ports might have been known at Copenhagen, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That being altogether unaware of the particular points in Mr. Buchanan's despatch upon which your Lordship desires my opinion, or of the object for which that opinion is required, and being wholly ignorant of what instructions Mr. Buchanan may have received from your Lordship as to the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic, I proceed with considerable diffidence, frankly and without reserve, to state to your Lordship the observations which occur to me as arising upon the face of that despatch, and I trust I shall be pardoned if, in consideration of these circumstances, I should appear to press anything unduly, or to adopt too harsh a tone. Subject to these considerations, it is to be observed that the question is simply:—"When was the existence of the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic known at Copenhagen, not officially, but as a matter of political and commercial intelligence?" This is the question upon which Mr. Buchanan is requested to give all the information and assistance in his power.

Subject to these considerations I observe—

(1.) That Mr. Buchanan does not clearly state his own knowledge, or impression, or opinion as to the date when the existence of the blockade was known at Copenhagen. I infer from the general tenor of his despatch that he thinks that it was known before June, but that he cannot prove it, or give any grounds or reason for so thinking.

(2.) That he does not state what particular steps he took to ascertain this. He merely says:—"The persons whom I employed to obtain this information, and who from their pursuits I had reason to believe would have been able to procure it, failed in their endeavours to meet my wishes." He does not state what information they did give him, or that they gave him any information at all, or to what means they had recourse in order to procure it.

A careful search both of all the Danish newspapers and of other newspapers circulated at Copenhagen, especially as to ship news, would appear to me to be an essential and obvious preliminary measure. If Mr. Buchanan has made such a search, and has found absolutely nothing, the complexion of the case is, I must admit, very much changed; if this has not been done, the first and most obvious measure to acquire the information has not as yet been taken.

I cannot, however, at present believe that all the Danish newspapers were absolutely silent for more than a month upon a topic of great public and local interest, as to which the newspapers of neighbouring countries were full of intelligence. The geographical position of Copenhagen renders it both easy and important to give notice there and at Elsinore of blockade in the Baltic, to all vessels entering the Baltic, which would thereby be rendered liable to capture if continuing their voyage to any blockaded port, as soon as they got three miles from the Danish coast. I cannot but suppose that the Admiral and Mr. Buchanan must have concerted measures to insure this being done as early as practicable; and I cannot understand how such measures have entirely failed in securing so essential an object.

Copenhagen and Elsinore are, moreover, great centres of communication in all that relates to shipping in the Baltic. Intelligence reaches Copenhagen from Hamburgh, as I understand, in about sixty hours. The actual existence of the blockade was a matter of notoriety at Hamburgh, and at all the ports of North Germany, where the newspapers often published and alluded to it before the end of April.

This is proved by the newspapers themselves, and by affidavits made to this effect in the Prize Court by Colonel Lloyd Hodges and Lord Bloomfield.

I beg also to refer to the "Times" newspaper of the 4th May, which contains, under the head "Hamburgh, April 30," the following passages:—"A private letter from the fleet off Gottske Sound, and dated the 19th instant, contains the following remarks:—Most of our time has been spent blockading the various passages through which strange vessels can properly sail into the Gulphs of Bothnia and Finland;" and further on this passage occurs:—"A letter from the fleet, dated Copenhagen, April 27, states that Sir C. Napier, with the line-of-battle ships under Admirals Corrie and Chads, were by the latest accounts keeping up a rigorous blockade of the Gulf of Finland, which would render the escape of a single vessel impossible. Cruizers are stationed off Revel, Memel, Riga, Dantzig, Stockholm, Gothland, Bornholm, in the Sound, Kattyal, and Gulf of Kiel, so that the whole Baltic Sea and coasts were under strict guard. The 'Tribune' left Copenhagen for England on the 26th April with one of her prizes, having captured six."

I request that these papers may be duly considered in connection with my Report of the 10th November instant.*

Mr. Buchanan knew before Sir C. Napier left Keoge Bay that it was his immediate intention to blockade all the Russian ports, for which the Admiral had an ample force. He states that he received letters from Sir C. Napier, dated off the Gulf of Finland, as early as the 17th April.†

It is most probable that many vessels touched at Copenhagen and Elsinore coming from the fleet, or having been warned off by it, during April and May. The Hamburgh papers of the end of April must have reached Copenhagen three days after date. The "Times" of May 4 (above alluded to) must, I presume, have reached Copenhagen by the 12th or 15th May.

I own that I cannot comprehend how it happened that on so important a subject Mr. Buchanan remained without any definite information as to the blockade having been established until June.

The question whether there really did exist a de facto blockade or not was one of very great importance. Mr. Buchanan was constantly applied to for certificates to prove the fact. He states that he did not consider himself justified in giving any definite certificates until he received Sir C. Napier's despatch of May 27. He must have long felt himself in a painful state of uncertainty and embarrassment on the subject, and I presume that he made every possible effort to put an end to such uncertainty; but I own that I do not understand how all such efforts proved unavailing.

With respect to the certificates of the blockade which Mr. Buchanan was requested to grant, I have only to observe that the circumstances which he himself states would, in my opinion, have justified him in giving a certificate that to the best of his knowledge and belief such blockade existed, and I do not see how he could, under any circumstances, have strictly certified to anything beyond this.

In conclusion, I have to observe that in the present doubtful state of the matter in question I would venture to suggest that no direct answer can conveniently be given to the note of the Danish Chargé d'Affaires, of September 28, transmitted to me with Mr. Hammond's letter on October 3; or to another such note of the 20th October, transmitted to me with Mr. Hammond's letter on October 25.

I consider that not only considerable pecuniary interests, but that the credit of the Government, is involved in proving, if possible, that due regard was paid to neutral rights by Her Majesty's ships, and that the masters of captured vessels now before the Prize Court, as well as the Danish authorities and commercial public, were not ignorant of the blockade for a month after all North Germany knew of it. Indeed, at first sight, this affected ignorance on their part is absolutely incredible. I cannot as yet believe it to be a real, honest, bonâ fide ignorance; but I much fear the result both upon the Prize Court, and upon public opinion of the evidence of Mr. Buchanan, as contained in an affidavit he has made, which is confined to the official communications as to blockade, and his absolute silence as to his own knowledge or belief on the subject, coupled with a similar silence on the part of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Larlham. It will, I fear, be asked, and argued with great weight:—"How can the Crown pretend to say that this was a valid blockade, and was known to be existing in April or May, when even its own servants in Denmark do not say that they had any information or belief whatever upon the point until June?" And I do not see how this is easily answered.

I have, &c.

P.S.—I beg to observe that many of the above points, which appear to me to be obscure and open to remarks, may not improbably be easily explained by reference to other papers which I may not have seen.

Transfer of ships from Russian to neutral flag at Messina.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 25th November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit, for my information, the accompanying copy of a despatch, and its inclosures, in original, from Mr. Rickards, the Acting British Consul at Messina, containing information respecting the transfer of ships from Russian to neutral flags.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the "Soglosie" has been seized and proceeded against in the Prize Court; further proof has been ordered by the Court, and the case is pending.

That with reference to the other vessels mentioned by Mr. Rickards, I would venture to suggest that the attention of the Admiralty and of the Customs may be usefully directed to them. Mr. Rickards can communicate further information as to the sailing and destination of some of them, especially the "Grossfurst Alexander," alias "Hermann," which seems a particularly suspicious case, she having assumed the Danish flag after the war and whilst in a Neapolitan port, where she still is.

Facilities for improper use of Danish flag.

I beg to observe that this communication affords further proof of the great facilities afforded by the Danish Government to the improper use of its flag to cover Russian interests, to which I have on former occasions adverted.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note which your Lordship has received from the French Ambassador at this Court, stating the opinion of his Government on the question of the detention in certain cases of vessels belonging to neutral Powers, and that his Excellency requests to be informed whether the opinion of Her Majesty's Government coincides with that of the French Government; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that I would take Count Walewski's note into my immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest possible convenience what answer should be returned to his Excellency.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Expeditions fitted out in friendly States.

That with reference to the general principles of international law applicable to cases of attempts made by the subjects or citizens of one friendly Power to interfere by force of arms with those of another friendly Power, I beg to refer to my report of the 15th February last, upon expeditions then supposed to be fitting out in United States' ports, designed against Mexico and Central America, and more especially to the first portion of that report.

high seas neutral vessels conveying arms and ammunition from neutral ports not destined for the use of the Queen's enemies, I beg to refer to my report of the 25th March last* upon the instructions of your Lordship to the Admiralty as to certain vessels conveying arms from Belgium to the revolted subjects of the Sultan, and especially to the latter portion of that report. Subject to the principles laid down in those reports (which will, I trust, be found to bear upon the present question), I beg to observe, with reference to Count Walewski's note, that all the earlier portion of it which defines certain acts as not amounting to piracy, jure gentium, and which states the strict legal limits beyond which even friendly nations must not pass in their desire to check such lawless enterprizes as those alluded to, appears to me to contain a generally correct statement of international law and usage to which Her Majesty's Government may properly assent.

(With reference to attack on Cuba by United States' citizens.)

I am by no means sure that I clearly understand the meaning of the last two pages of Count Walewski's note, commencing with the words, "Il y a une hypothése," &c. The real question for consideration (as I apprehend it) is, what steps may Great Britain and France justly take by international law for the purpose of preventing the success of forcible and irregular attempts made or supported by citizens of the United States against Spanish authorities in Cuba? If by this last passage, and especially by the words "le droit d'avertissement ou d'empêchement passif," his Excellency means to suggest that although vessels under the United States or other friendly flags, carrying men, or arms, or ammunition, destined to make or support an internal revolt in, or a forcible attack on, Cuba, cannot be captured on the high seas nor seized within French or British jurisdiction, unless by virtue of some positive law which they have actually violated within such jurisdiction, yet that they may be watched and followed, and every warning and information and indirect assistance may be given to secure the defeat of their object and the apprehension and condign punishment by Spanish authorities of all concerned, then it will be seen, by reference to my Report of the 15th February, I entirely concur with this view. If I should have misapprehended the meaning of his Excellency, I must request to be favoured with some further explanations.

It will, of course, be desirable that the instructions issued by France and by Great Britain to their naval officers on this subject should be mutually communicated, and, if possible, be identical.

WITH reference to the blockade cases I am conducting in the High Court of Admiralty on the part of the Crown, and which are to be adjudicated upon very shortly, I have the honour to request your Lordship's assistance in order that I may be immediately furnished with the names of one or two persons in or near London who have been at Riga, and who can speak to the circulation of the English "Times" newspaper, and also to the circulation of certain foreign newspapers in that port.

It is also most desirable that I should obtain some evidence as to the communication by post between Memel and Riga.

My Lord,

IT is very desirable in causes now pending in the Prize Court relative to the blockade of Riga, for the Crown to offer legal proof, by affidavits from persons who can speak from personal knowledge, that whatever matters of public interest (as blockades) are known at Memel, are also known at Riga within two or three days, and that the Hamburgh and North German newspapers are regularly received there. The Queen's Proctor, notwithstanding his active exertions in the matter, has from various causes hitherto failed in procuring such proof.

If there are any gentlemen in or near London who can make the necessary affidavits from personal knowledge, especially any who were in Riga or Memel in May last, I would venture to suggest that their names and addresses might be forthwith sent to the Queen's Proctor. Riga blockade.

SINCE I had the honour of addressing your Lordship yesterday, I have been referred to, and had an interview with, Madame Lousada, the lady of the Marquis de Lousada, Her Majesty's late Consul at Riga, and she has informed me of the steps which the Marquis took to make the blockade of the Russian ports known to the merchants and others residing there.

Consul Lousada's evidence wanted.

The evidence which he can afford appears to be so important, and which cannot be supplied by any other person, that I have to request your Lordship will be pleased to direct him to be summoned home by the electric telegraph, and to bring all documents which may in any wise relate to the blockade with him.

I beg leave to add that if the Marquis is here by Tuesday or Wednesday it will be in sufficient time; and, looking to the great importance of the cause, I should be sorry if his arrival were longer delayed.

My Lord,

Blockade of Black Sea ports.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd of November instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing the copy of the draft of a notification of blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea which Admiral Dundas proposes to issue, and to request that I would take this draft into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether this is a proper notification.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Notification.

That with a view to making the proposed draft notification more clear and intelligible, I have introduced various alterations and amendments therein (in a fresh draft herewith sent), as to which I have had the benefit of the assistance of Captain Washington, R.N., of the Admiralty. I would, however, recommend the careful reconsideration of the notification by the Admiralty in conjunction with Admiral Dundas' draft.

Names should be clearly stated.

With a view of avoiding any mistake in the description of the ports, rivers, and coasts intended to be blockaded, I consider it to be unadvisable in a notification to refer to lines supposed to be drawn upon a chart; the ports, places, and coasts to be blockaded should be clearly and distinctly described, so as to be unmistakeably clear, and not open to cavil or doubt, and in the manner in which I have endeavoured to describe them without reference to their being north of any particular line supposed to be drawn on a chart.

With reference to the blockade of the ports of Eupatoria and Balaclava, contemplated by Admiral Dundas, I have the honour to report that, considering such a measure to be fraught with the most injurious consequences to the interests of the allies, I obtained an interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty on the point, and I was informed by him that, regard being had to the existing circumstances, Balaclava ought certainly not to be blockaded, nor should Eupatoria be blockaded if it still remains in the occupation of the allies. I have accordingly, for this reason, expressly excepted these two ports from the notification.

As to Eupatoria and Balaclava.

I observe that Admiral Dundas contemplates the complete and simultaneous blockade, on and from the same day, of all the Russian coasts and ports in the Black Sea and the Sea of Azoff; this will, of course, be legal, if completely and simultaneously effected; but looking to the extent of coast, and the very different positions of the principal ports, I would venture to submit that it might be more advisable to notify the blockade of the principal commercial ports (such, for instance, as Odessa) as and when it may be actually established in the case of each, and without waiting for one general and simultaneous notification.

Recommends separate notices for blockade of principal ports,

The object of the blockade being to prevent commercial intercourse, the large trading ports of the enemy are the chief object; the smaller ports and the lines of coast without ports being comparatively unimportant. Bearing this in mind, I would respectfully suggest that at least one vessel should be stationed as near to each principal port as practicable, independently of any line of blockade to be generally maintained. This, however, is a question for the decision of Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with its allies. I presume that the naval force of the allies is adequate for the purpose, and that it will be so disposed as to make the ingress to and egress from, each and every port and river blockaded impossible, at least without great and obvious danger of capture.

Adverting to the absence of any blockade of these ports hitherto, excepting as to the Danube, and to the extensive neutral trade and commercial interests connected with some of them, I would venture to suggest the expediency of the Senior Naval Officer in each case communicating by flag of truce or otherwise, as may be most convenient, particularly to the neutral Consuls at each port in which there may be neutral vessels lying, the fact of the establishment of the blockade, so as to prevent any possible ignorance of it (whether real or pretended) on the part of the masters of such vessels.

And communication by fleet to neutral Consuls at ports to be blockaded.

I observe that there is no reference in the Notification to the naval forces of Turkey. I presume that this is intentional.

My Lord,

WITH reference to my Report of the 10th of November as to Mr. Taylor and the Consuls in the Baltic, and to my Report of the 22nd of November,* upon a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, I have now the honour to report—

Blockade of Riga, &c.

Dates when known at Copenhagen.

That since the date of the latter Report (22nd November) I have been referred by the Queen's Proctor to certain Danish newspapers published at Copenhagen, and sent to him by Mr. Buchanan under date of the 10th November. Some of these newspapers, published at Copenhagen on the 19th of May, contain a distinct notice of the blockade of Riga, Windau, and Libau, and I would respectfully submit that they tend to corroborate and confirm some of the observations I have made in those Reports.

I have therein particularly adverted to the difficulty I felt, and the strong doubts I entertained on the subject of the remarkable ignorance which is alleged to have existed throughout Denmark, both on the part of the Danish authorities and of Her Majesty's Consular and Diplomatic servants of the actual establishment of any blockade of Russian ports in the Baltic until the month of June last, although the blockade was announced in German newspapers and was notorious throughout North Germany by the end of April.

It is now apparent that, at all events, the Danish newspapers of the 19th and 20th of May contained a distinct notice of such blockade.

I am not, however, as yet by any means satisfied that this was the earliest date at which the blockade was known in Denmark.

In the absence of any such information, I trust I shall be excused for suggesting that I cannot place entire reliance upon the somewhat vague and general statement of the origin, objects, and proceedings of this Company which are contained in the communications of his Excellency the French Ambassador. The British Government is doubtless well informed on this subject by its own servants, and if I were put in possession of such information I could advise with greater satisfaction. The legal designation and place of business of this Company, the name or names under which it holds ships, and the names and descriptions of the vessels purchased by the Company, and the dates and places of each purchase, would be at all events desirable.

My Lord,

Fraudulent assumption of Mecklenburgh colours by Russian vessel "Ernst Merck."

I BEG to bring under your Lordship's notice the case of the ship "Ernst Merck," which was seized at Hull in June last under Mecklenburgh colours, and with Mecklenburgh papers, and claimed as the sole property of citizens of Mecklenburgh. Further proof was permitted to the claimants, and after elaborate argument she was condemned as Russian property by the Admiralty Court on the 6th December.

The Judgment pronounced by the Court (a copy of the short-hand writer's report of which I have the honour to transmit herewith) fully explains all the circumstances of the case, and all the papers can be obtained, if necessary, from the Admiralty Proctor. I have marked in pencil some passages at pages 33–39 of the Judgment referring to her false Mecklenburgh papers, and to the conduct of the Mecklenburgh authorities in the matter, and it is especially to be observed that the master was, as alleged by the claimants, naturalized under the Great Seal of Mecklenburgh without ever having been in the dominions of the Grand Duchy for more than two days, and the vessel obtained Mecklenburgh papers when lying in a Russian port, and without having been in a Mecklenburgh port at all; and the Court appears to have been of opinion that there was some ground for suspecting very culpable misconduct or remissness on the part of the Mecklenburgh authorities. Under these circumstances your Lordship might perhaps think it proper to bring this case formally to the notice of the Mecklenburgh Government.

My Lord,

Baltic blockade. Raising of.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of this day's date stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, inclosing copies of two reports from Rear-Admiral Chads respecting the cessation of the blockade of Russian ports in the Baltic, and to request that I would take the same into my consideration and draw up and transmit to your Lordship a proper notification of the cessation of the said blockade for insertion in the "Gazette" of Friday next, the 15th instant, if I should be of opinion that such notification is required.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Notification necessary.

That I am of opinion that a formal notification of raising of the blockade in question is necessary, and I have accordingly prepared, and herewith transmit, a notification for insertion in the "London Gazette."

I observe with reference to Admiral Chad's letters: (1.) That in the longer letter dated "Her Majesty's ship 'Edinburgh,' Kiel, December 8" (marked No. 3), the Admiral expressly enumerates the ports the blockade of which he states "has been raised from this date" (December 8).

As to dates, &c.

In the shorter letter of the same date (not numbered or otherwise identified) Admiral Chads states that "the 'Imperieux' and 'Dragon' have arrived from the Gulph of Finland, consequently the blockade of the Russian ports now ceases." He incloses a letter to himself from Captain Watson of Her Majesty's ship "Imperieuse" (also dated Kiel, December 8), from which I should apprehend that the blockade was in fact raised on or before December 4; inasmuch, however, as Admiral Chads distinctly states the 8th as the date from which the blockade was raised, I have adopted this date in the notification.

Insertion of names.

I have further ventured, with some hesitation, to include in the notification "Oro" and "Abo," which were named in the "Gazette" notice of June 16, but which were not named in the notification of the raising of the blockade of the 3rd November, and are not referred to or included in the limit given by Admiral Chads.

I conclude that the fact is there no longer exists any blockade of these or of any other Russian ports or places in the Baltic. It may perhaps be proper before publishing this notification to communicate this Report and a copy of the draft notification to the Admiralty, with a view to insure the correctness of the notification.

Doctors' Commons, December 16, 1854.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th November last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels respecting a claim preferred by Her Majesty's Consul at Antwerp to receive a share of prize-money in the case of the "San Spiridion," which vessel was detained at Malta on account of her having on board a quantity of arms for the Greek Government as well as some "armes de luxe" consigned to a private house at Athens.

Consul's claim to share of prize money for having given information leading to condemnation of vessels.

Lord Wodehouse is further pleased to state that your Lordship is not aware that the "San Spiridion" has been condemned, and requests that I would take Consul Johnson's claim into consideration, and report to your Lordship what are the law and practice in regard to awarding to Consuls a share of prize-money in cases in which vessels have been condemned as prize in consequence of information furnished by them.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That with reference to the law and practice in question, I have to observe:—

Prizes seized in British ports are property of Sovereign.

1. That all vessels seized as prizes of war in British ports (as distinguished from those captured at sea) become, upon condemnation, "droits of Admiralty," they vest in the Sovereign in her office of Admiralty, and not, strictly speaking, jure coronæ. These droits being made a part of the Consolidated Fund by Statute 1 Vict., c. 2, s. 2, it is competent to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to direct any payment to be made as a reward for information or otherwise, either to a Consul or to any other person out of the proceeds of such droits. Such payments are expressly contemplated and provided for by the same Act, section 12. During the late war such rewards were (as I am informed) often given.

Informants may be rewarded from proceeds.

Prizes captured by Revenue cruizers, ditto.

2. With respect to prizes of war captured at sea by revenue cruizers, these are by the Prize Act 17 and 18 Vict., cap. 18, sec. 13, upon condemnation, vested in the Queen in her office of Admiralty. Her Majesty may, by Sign Manual, dispose thereof absolutely at her discretion, and she may consequently reward out of the proceeds all persons giving information.

Prizes captured by Royal Navy are property of captors. Informants cannot be rewarded from proceeds.

3. With respect to prizes captured at sea by ships of the Royal Navy, commanded by naval officers, the proceeds thereof are by the Prize Act, section 5, upon condemnation, vested in the captors, and must be divided amongst them according to the Royal Proclamation of March 29, 1854.

Persons giving information as to such vessels cannot, therefore, legally be rewarded out of the proceeds, they must be left to the bounty of the Crown.

With reference to the case of the "San Spiridion," I beg to state that notwithstanding Mr. Johnson's distinct and official assertions to the contrary: (1). There is no Prize Court at Malta. (2). That the "San Spiridion" has not been condemned at all; proceedings are now pending against her in the High Court of Admiralty.

I have further to observe that as far as relates to prizes of war, I am ignorant of any law or practice to the effect stated by Mr. Johnson, viz.: "When contraband goods are seized upon the information of a Consul he is entitled to a share of the prize money."

I beg distinctly to disclaim any intention of making any charge against Mr. Consul Johnson, but I am certainly unable to discover upon what authority he officially states either the facts or the law as he does.

Consuls might be rewarded for information.

I may in conclusion be perhaps permitted to suggest that in my opinion the giving liberal rewards to Consuls for information leading to seizures and captures in war would be both just and expedient.

My Lord,

Treaties with Denmark exempting vessels from confiscation for breaking blockades.

I BEG to report that in the case of the "Francisca," a Danish vessel captured for breach of blockade in the Baltic, and which is to be heard in the Admiralty Court on the 20th December, the claimants have, upon application to the Danish Legation at this Court (as I understand), been furnished with extracts from the Treaty of 1670 between Great Britain and Denmark (Art. XVI), and from the Treaty between those Powers of 1814 (Art. XIII).

They will, perhaps, at the hearing of the case, contend that under Art. XVI of the Treaty of 1670, revived by Art. XIII of the Treaty of 1814, Danish ships are protected from confiscation even in cases where they may attempt (without having contraband of war on board) to violate blockades, or they will attempt some argument of this nature.

Wants information.

As I was not previously aware of these Treaty stipulations, and as I do not remember that the Danish Government has, in any of the various communications which it has made to your Lordship (at least, in any which I have seen) on the subject of the war, and of captures of Danish vessels for breach of blockade, made any allusion to these Treaties, or attempted any such arguments in reference thereto as will now be attempted or contended for any exemption for their merchant vessels from the penalty of confiscation for breaking blockade, I should be glad to be favoured with any information which may be in your Lordship's possession upon this subject at the earliest possible period, in order to assist me, as Counsel for the Crown, in dealing, on the 20th instant, with the arguments which may be expected from the Counsel for the Claimants, who are assisted, apparently, in this matter by the Danish Legation.

My Lord,

Treaties with Sweden exempting vessels from confiscation for breaking blockades.

IN the cases of the "Johanna Maria" and the "Nornen," two Swedish vessels captured for breach of blockade, and which are to be heard in the Admiralty Court on the 20th December, the claimants appear disposed to rely upon the XIth Article of the Treaty between Great Britain and Sweden of 1661, revived by the IInd Article of the Treaty of Orbro in 1812, as exempting Swedish vessels from confiscation for breach of blockade.

Wants information.

I should be glad to be furnished with any information upon this question of which your Lordship may be in possession, in order to enable me, on behalf of the Crown, to answer the arguments which the Claimant's Counsel may adduce on the 20th instant.

My Lord,

Export of grain from Russian ports by Tuscan merchants.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th December instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the French Ambassador at this Court, relative to the equivocal proceedings of certain merchants at Leghorn respecting export of grain from Russian ports, and to request that I would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the course proposed by Count Walewski with a view of checking those proceedings.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Best remedy is a rigorous blockade.

That the most effective course proposed by Count Walewski, with a view of checking these proceedings, appears to me the establishment of a rigorous blockade of Odessa and of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, and the preventing the egress of all neutral vessels unless with cargoes actually laden at the date of the commencement of such blockade, together with the exertion of proper vigilance generally by the allied cruizers, especially as to Greek, Tuscan, and Ionian ships.

I do not consider that there is any reasonable chance of proving, to the satisfaction of a British Prize Court, that grain exported from Russia by neutrals under the circumstances indicated can be considered as Russian property, although bought and paid for by the exporter, or that a neutral owner of it could be fairly considered or treated as the Agent of the Russian Government.

Warning is no use.

With reference to his Excellency's suggestion of addressing a warning to the Tuscan Government of the dangers which its subjects may incur by taking advantage of the permission of the Russian Government for the export of cereals, I greatly doubt the practical result of such a measure. It can hardly be expected that the Tuscan Government will interfere to check the trade of its subjects with Russia, especially considering the tone and spirit exhibited by the Tuscan Government in relation to the facilities afforded for the use of their flag by Russian ships alluded to in my reports of July 1, July 15, and July 26, 1854.

I do not consider that the Tuscan or any other neutral Government is entitled to expect any such warning; the allies will, in my opinion, be perfectly justified in resorting, without previous warning, to a blockade of any Russian harbours which will be attended with the usual consequences to all neutrals concerned. Such warning has been, to a certain extent, given by the letter recently addressed by the Admiralty to the Chairman of Lloyds, of which (having no copy) I cannot give the date.

If any neutrals are entitled to favourable consideration, or to any friendly intimation in regard to such a blockade, I would venture to suggest that, having regard to existing political circumstances and combinations, Austria may possibly be considered by Her Majesty's Government to be favourably distinguished from other Powers in this respect.

I would venture, in conclusion, to point out that I presume that some very sufficient reasons (with which I am unacquainted) have hitherto prevented the blockade of Odessa, and other Russian harbours in the Black Sea, and it will be for your Lordship to consider whether the permission to Tuscans to export grain from the harbours (alluded to by Count Walewski) is likely to have such an important effect as to determine the allies to resort to such a blockade.

My Lord,

Billeting of Austrian soldiers on British subjects in Principalities.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th December, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, together with its inclosure, respecting the billeting of Austrian soldiers on British subjects in the Principalities; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon the instruction given by Lord Stratford to Mr. Colquhoun upon this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am not aware of any principle upon which, independent of Treaty stipulations, British owners of houses in foreign countries are placed in a different position as regards the obligation of lodging soldiers from British tenants of such houses.

British subjects must be treated as natives, in absence of Treaties.

British subjects, whether owners or tenants of houses under such circumstances, cannot, as far as I am aware, strictly or legally claim to be treated differently from the other inhabitants. In the absence of positive Treaties, laws, or regulations on the subject, they must, I apprehend, submit to the requirements of the military officer or Commander, who must judge of the necessity of quartering troops upon them. Subject to this observation, I concur in his Lordship's instruction to Mr. Colquhoun.

Hanoverian vessel "Reinhard."

Further documents not produced to Prize Court.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 19th ultimo, he was directed to transmit to me therewith a note from the Hanoverian Minister at this Court, inclosing copies of the documents relating to the case of the Hanoverian vessel "Reinhard," now before the Admiralty Prize Court, and which documents Count Kielmansegge inadvertently omitted to be handed into that Court; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the reply which should be returned to Count Kielmansegge.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as there is not with the papers any copy of your Lordship's note of the 25th November, to which the Count's note of the 7th is an answer, I am scarcely in a position to say whether the Count's note requires any reply. Subject to this observation, I would venture to suggest that, if any reply should be considered requisite, it may be to the effect that it now appears clearly that the bill brief was not given up by the master with the other ship's papers, and is not even now before the Prize Court; that this fact, coupled with other circumstances in the case, make it, in your Lordship's opinion, necessary that the case should be left to the decision of the Prize Court.

Send to Queen's Proctor.

I would further suggest, that the papers transmitted by Count Kielmansegge (affidavit of Caslientieck and Scplators, affidavit of Bolwin, and document, described as brief bill, of the "Reinhard") should be transmitted to the Queen's Proctor.

My Lord,

Russian subjects in Turkey trading with England.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th December instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. R. L. Fraser, inclosing a copy of a communication addressed by him to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury respecting the carrying on of trade with this country by Russian subjects domiciled in Turkey, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion upon the principles laid down by Mr. Frazer in his letter to the Treasury.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken Mr. Fraser's letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I cannot concur with Mr. Fraser as to the application of the principles of international law alluded to by him to the particular transaction in question.

Not considered an enemy if domiciled in Turkey.

A Russian subject by birth, if commercially domiciled in the Turkish dominions, will not be considered and dealt with as an enemy in a British Prize Court; a British merchant residing here and trading with such a person is not guilty of "trading with the enemy;" the national character of parties is not in such cases determined by the place of their birth, but by that of their domicile. I presume that the Russian subject in question, who is domiciled at Smyrna, is under the protection of the Consul of some European State, and is treated by the Turkish Government as the subject of such State, and as a friend and not an enemy; his precise legal "national character" may be a matter open to some doubt, but he cannot, in my opinion, be considered under the circumstances stated as "an enemy of the Queen."

Property not liable to capture.

A Greek merchant domiciled at Liverpool is, in my opinion, not acting illegally in dealing with such a person, nor is the property of either party embarked in the course of such dealing liable to capture or confiscation.

Recent Order in Council permits trade with enemy, and protects enemy's goods in neutral vessel.

I have further to observe that although all trading with the enemy by British subjects was formally illegal and subjected all goods engaged therein to capture and confiscation, yet that such trading has been recognized, permitted, and sanctioned by Her Majesty's Order in Council, 15th April, 1854, and cannot now be considered as illegal, at least according to my interpretation of that Order.

If this particular question be considered important I should much desire to have the assistance of the Attorney- and Solicitor-General thereon.

I may add that the madder roots in question, even if enemy's property, would, if laden on board a neutral vessel, be protected by Her Majesty's Declaration of March 28.

I would venture to submit to your Lordship that it may not be expedient to enter fully into any explanation of these abstract principles of international law with Mr. Frazer (who will perhaps publish any answer which he may receive), but that it may be sufficient to inform him that Her Majesty's Government have no intention of interfering with the particular transaction in question, which does not appear to them to be illegal.

My Lord,

Dutch vessel detained off Sulina.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st December last, stating that with reference to my Report of the 1st November,* upon the case of the two merchant-vessels "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," detained off Sulina by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, the draft of a letter which your Lordship caused to be addressed to the Admiralty, requesting that Department to procure the information which I stated in my above-mentioned Report I considered necessary before arriving at a decision in this matter.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to inclose the answer which has been received from the Admiralty, and to request that I would take the same, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship any further observations I may have to offer upon this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I see no sufficient reason for modifying the opinion which I have expressed on this case in my Report of the 29th July, 1854.

In accordance with that report the principal question now to be considered is whether I correctly assumed and apprehended the facts to be as therein stated.

That Report was, I presume, submitted to Admiral Dundas for his observations, which observations appear to be contained in the Admiral's letter to the Admiralty dated "Britannia, off the Katacha, November 26, 1854." (No. 626 in Admiralty of December 15, 1854.)

Cargoes partly contraband of war.

If this be so, I have only further to observe that it appears to me that the facts must be taken as admitted by the Admiral to be in effect as assumed in my Report of the 29th July, with the important exception that he states the cargoes of the ships in question to have been "partly contraband of war." Inasmuch, however, as the Admiral gives no particulars, I am unable to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion on this particular point. The bills of lading, invoices, and other ship's papers, which will, of course, be produced by the Netherlands Government will, I presume, enable Her Majesty's Government to form a correct opinion on this particular subject.

* No. 209.

Excludes claim for compensation. Vessels might have been captured although no blockade existed.

I may observe that if these vessels were in fact even partially laden with articles "contraband of war" destined for the use of the enemy, this will effectually exclude any claim for compensation; the vessels might have been lawfully captured and sent in for adjudication on this ground, quite irrespectively of any question of blockade, and it is only to be regretted that this course was not adopted.

The Admiral further states that he "has no doubt that the masters of the vessels were fully aware of the illegal nature of their proceedings, and that a blockade would probably be soon established, but that he has means of substantiating this."

With respect to the alleged illegality of these proceedings, I have already in my Report of the 29th July remarked that if I have rightly apprehended the facts their proceedings were not illegal, and I do not understand to what particular illegality the Admiral adverts. If this consisted in carrying contraband of war to the enemy, I can only say that he did not treat them as guilty of so doing.

With respect to their knowledge of an impending blockade I must observe that if the Admiral is not only unable to substantiate this conclusion, but also unable to adduce any facts or arguments whatsoever in support of it, I fear that it cannot be safely assumed or insisted upon as correct by Her Majesty's Government.

In conclusion, I would venture to suggest, that the Netherlands Government may perhaps be informed that before Her Majesty's Government can entertain any question of compensation, it must be clearly shown that there was no contraband of war on board either vessel, and that the masters had no reason on quitting Constantinople to apprehend that any blockade of the Danube was in immediate contemplation.

I may further state, that in not absolutely refusing any compensation in this case, I consider that Her Majesty's Government will have acted very liberally, will have evinced a very scrupulous regard to neutral rights, and an earnest desire both to conciliate a friendly Government (which in the recent case of the "Yonge Albert" acted under trying circumstances with a strict regard to Her Majesty's belligerent rights), and to avoid the infliction of any unavoidable personal hardships upon innocent individuals. The complexion of the case would, of course, be materially affected should it transpire that there really was any want of good faith, either as to the nature and destination of the cargoes or the previous knowledge that a blockade was immediately impending, or as to any other material fact.

My Lord,

Supplies from Danube to French army in Crimea. Would grant of passes for vitiate the blockade?

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a correspondence between Admirals Dundas and Hammelin, respecting a proposal made by the latter officer that certain merchant-vessels should be furnished with a pass to enable them to carry supplies from the Danube to the French army in the Crimea; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion, at my earliest convenience, whether the grant of such passes would vitiate the blockade of the Danube.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Admiral Hammelin's expressions in his two letters to Admiral Dundas are so indefinite that I must confess my inability to understand the real meaning and extent of the proposed relaxation of the blockade of the Danube. I do not understand from what places within the mouth of the Danube, or from whose dominions, the corn is to be exported; I do not understand whether the vessels which are to have the passes in question, are French, British, Turkish, neutral, or of all these denominations; nor do I understand whether they are simply to act as transports chartered by or employed in the public service of the French Government, or whether it is intended to grant passes to vessels of all nations in order to enable them to enter the Danube, and export from whatsoever place they may select (whether in the actual possession of the allies or of the enemy), cargoes of corn which are afterwards to be disposed of to the French army for the private profit of merchants, contractors, or others concerned as an ordinary commercial enterprize or speculation. It is obvious that very different considerations apply to these very different cases.

Passes would hazard validity of blockade.

In the absence of any more distinct information, I can therefore only say that in my opinion the validity of the blockade would be exposed to considerable hazard, legally speaking, by the blockading squadron permitting any general commercial intercourse to be carried on by neutrals, and especially with places in the possession of the enemy under a system of passes from a French Military Intendant such as appears to be contemplated.

Licences by the Sovereign are allowable.

This intercourse might legally be carried on by licence, but a licence is considered by British Prize Courts to be an act of sovereignty, and cannot be issued by a civil or military officer of his own authority.

I am not aware whether the pass of the French Military Intendant would be considered in France as equivalent to the licence of the Sovereign, but I presume it would not be so considered. The form of pass should, in my opinion, be that of a licence issued by Sovereign authority, if it be desired to avoid risking the validity of the blockade.

Belligerent Power might export its own property in its own transports.

If, however, one of the belligerent Powers engaged in the blockade should desire to export its own national property in its own transports, such a proceeding, not being of a commercial character, is open to very different, and more favourable considerations, even if merely sanctioned by such a pass as proposed. I am not, however, aware of any precedent for such a relaxation, and should be glad to be referred to any which may be in existence.

Upon the whole, I must observe that, inasmuch as by means of a licence from the Sovereign, either the operations in question, or any other commercial intercourse, even with the enemy, may be legalized without seriously hazarding the validity of a blockade, I fear that any expedient falling short of this in its essential character, by virtue of which commercial intercouse with places in the enemy's possession is permitted by the blockading squadron, must be considered as likely to expose the validity of the blockade to question and hazard.

I regret that, owing partly to the obscurity of Admiral Hammelin's expressions, and partly to the absence of any precedents in point, I am unable to give a more definite answer.

Blockade of Black Sea ports.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit for my information the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a communication from Vice-Admiral Dundas, and of the answer returned by that Department, on the subject of the blockade of certain Russian ports in the Black Sea. Mr. Hammond states that he is also directed to transmit to me the papers as noted in the margin of his letter which bear on this subject, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to offer on the letter from the Board of Admiralty of the 1st instant.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I do not see that I can usefully offer any observations upon the letter of the Board of Admiralty of the 1st of January.

Eupatoria and Balaclava.

From that letter, and its inclosures, it would appear that a copy of my Report of the 5th December, 1854,* has been transmitted to Admiral Dundas, and it also appears that the serious objections to the intended blockade of Eupatoria and Balaklava, to which I adverted in my report, have also attracted the attention of the French Government.

As to notifying a simultaneous blockade instead of each port separately.

In the absence of any information as to the motives or objects of the Admirals in attempting a general and simultaneous blockade of the whole of the Russian coasts of the Black Sea, after leaving all the Russian ports in that sea unblockaded up to the present moment, and in now giving one general notification thereof, I can only reiterate the opinion I have already expressed of the serious objections to such a measure in a legal point of view, and of the superior advantage of blockading and notifying the blockade of each of the prinicipal ports, as and when the same may be actually established, especially (for instance) Odessa, the blockade of which should not, in my opinion, be connected with and dependent on that (say) of Kertch, as proposed.

I trust that the naval officers employed in the blockade will have been furnished with copies of a memorandum on blockade which has been printed by the Admiralty, and that such instructions may be given both to Her Majesty's Naval and Consular officers as may at least tend to prevent the recurrence of the errors committed in the Baltic blockade, a recurrence of which may not unreasonably be apprehended in the case of the Black Sea, unless timely precautions are taken.

As to Treaty right of Denmark and Sweden to a special warning in cases of blockade.

My Lord,

WITH reference to my letter of the 16th December,* on the subject of the argument attempted to be relied upon by the claimants in the Admiralty Court in several Danish and Swedish prize cases now pending, I have the honour to state that the argument (which there is some reason to suppose has been suggested by the Danish or Swedish Legation here, and which is certaintly urged with their knowledge and sanction) appears to be in substance that the Treaty with Denmark of 1670, although it did not wholly exempt Danish vessels violating or disregarding a blockade from confiscation (which is not contended) yet secured to such vessels the privilege of a previous actual and individual warning on the spot from a cruizer; that this appears from the instructions to Her Majesty's vessels issued in June 1793, and formally communicated to the Danish and Swedish Governments by Diplomatic notes ("Annual Register, 1793," p. 174) to be the interpretation put by the British Government upon the Treaty; that the Treaty is in this as well as other portions confirmed by the Act of Accession of Denmark to the Treaty between Great Britain and Russia of 1801, and by the Treaty of Kiel of 1814; that this further appears to be the case from the fact of an explanatory Treaty having been entered into between Sweden and Great Britain in 1803, as to contraband of war, adverting to a Treaty with that Power of 1661, in the same words as that with Denmark of 1670.† With the able assistance of Dr. Jenner, the Junior Counsel for the Crown, I contended—

Arguments used before Prize Court.

(1.) That the Treaty of 1670 contained no allusion to any particular form of notice.

(2.) That the Danish Government had never in any previous case hitherto contended for any peculiar privilege under the Treaty of 1670 in this respect.

(3.) That it had not done so internationally in the present case, and that the absence of any existing distinct Treaty stipulation might be thence reasonably inferred.

(4.) That it did not appear that the Instructions of 1793 were based upon the Treaty of 1670, but that they might have been founded upon other considerations.

(5.) That if any such right could have been insisted upon under the Treaty of 1670, yet that the Treaty with Russia of 1801, acceded to by Denmark, especially by Articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, must be considered as having, in effect, abrogated the Treaty of 1670, if not wholly, yet, quoad hoc, at all events.

(6.) That the silence of the Explanatory Treaty of 1803 with Sweden on this point affords a strong inference against the construction now set up.

I anticipated the renewal and extension of these arguments in other cases, and British subjects contracting to supply ships of war to Russia.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 2nd January instant, stating that he was directed to state to us that Her Majesty's Government have been informed that the Emperor of Russia has contracted for the building and equipment of seventeen screw ships of the line, and that certain British subjects have undertaken to furnish engines for these vessels and even to construct the hulls of five of them; and further, that another British subject is at this moment in treaty with the Russian Government to provide the machinery of eight steam gun boats, to be ready in the ensuing spring. That it is further stated, that some at least of the English houses established in Russia have taken the chief contracts in connection with the above-mentioned vessels, and that they have severally accepted from the Emperor of Russia an advance of capital to the amount of fifty thousand pounds, to enable them to erect the necessary building and to purchase the requisite tools for the completion of their contracts; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take the circumstances above stated into consideration, and report to your Lordship as soon as possible whether British subjects engaged in such transactions are guilty of any offence punishable by law; and in that case whether it would be advisable to issue a proclamation as a warning, stating what constitutes an offence, and to what punishment the offenders are liable.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this subject in to consideration, and have the honour to report—

May be indicted for high treason.

That we are of opinion that all British subjects, whether resident in this country or abroad, who may equip or furnish materials for the equipment of ships of war for the service of the Emperor of Russia will be guilty of high treason. We think that all such persons so acting as are within reach of a British Court of Criminal Justice should be at once arrested and indicted for the crime they have been guilty of.

Those abroad may be warned by a Proclamation.

With respect to British subjects who are either resident in foreign countries, or who may have entered into contracts but not yet acted under them, a proclamation may be expedient stating the crime they will commit and the penalty they will incur by such conduct, and that they will be proceeded against with the utmost vigour of the law whenever they shall be found within the jurisdiction of a British Court of Justice.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received January 16.)

Doctors' Commons, January 13, 1855.

My Lord,

Danish Society for purchase of Russian vessels.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th December last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, containing the information relative to the supposed Danish Society for the purchase of Russian vessels, which I requested, to enable me to report upon the correspondence with the French Ambassador at this Court, submitted to me, for my consideration, on the 27th November.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot advise capture.

That inasmuch as neither Mr. Buchanan's nor Mr. Taylor's information corroborates that communicated by the French Legation on the subject of the particular Company in question, I cannot advise the capture or seizure of the vessels which are supposed to be its property (as recommended by France). The propriety of so doing may be left to the consideration of the French Government.

I observe that Mr. Buchanan makes use throughout of the general terms "ships" and "parties," and never gives the names of either, which is to be regretted. Mr. Taylor (as I understand his meaning) admits the lists of names furnished by the French Legation are correct, and that they own the "Mercurius" and "Helsingor," which they purchased from the previous Russian owners before the war. Mr. Taylor does not mention the date and place of the purchase of each, or give any information as to where they now are, which will be desirable. Mr. Taylor also alludes to the purchase of another Russian vessel, since lost, by some or all of the same persons since the war. He does not give her name or any other details.

More details wanted.

I have the honour to request that the attention of Messrs. Buchanan and Taylor may be invited to the necessity of full details being always given in these cases; such as the name, rig, tonnage, master's name, owner's name, and the port or voyage in which the vessel now is. I had, in my Report of the 8th December, requested to know these particulars, without which it is impossible for me to advise as to seizing or capturing the ships.

Discreditable conduct of Denmark with reference to fictitious sales, &c.

I have already, on several occasions, and I shall soon again call your Lordship's attention to the general conduct of the Danish authorities connected with the fraudulent sales of Russian ships to persons pretending to be Danes, and obtaining Danish documents, and every other support and facility, often contrary to Danish Law. In this and other points, especially in what relates to the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic, I am of opinion that the conduct of Denmark has been discreditably conspicuous, and very different from that of other neutral maritime Powers, such, for instance, as Holland, Prussia, and the Hans Towns.

Steps to be taken.

It may be proper for your Lordship to consider the propriety of at least issuing particular instructions for the exercise of great vigilance as to all vessels under the Danish flag, or of taking such other steps as may appear to Her Majesty's Government to be requisite to check or counteract the apparent tendency of Denmark to lend its sanction to operations adverse to the belligerent rights and interests of Her Majesty.

My Lord,

Liverpool claim against Russian Insurance Company of St. Petersburgh.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th December last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Herring respecting the claim of certain persons at Liverpool against the Russian Sea and River Insurance Company at St. Petersburgh, who are stated to have discontinued their payments to their Agents in England since the declaration of war against Russia; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Messrs. Herring.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Her Majesty's Government cannot assist. Russian Government not bound to pay.

That Messrs. Herring may be informed that your Lordship cannot hold out any hope that, on the termination of the war, you can assist the creditors of the "Russian Sea and River Insurance Company" to recover their debts from the Company, and that your Lordship does not consider that the Russian Government is entitled to (by which is meant "bound to") pay the debts of the Company.

1853-56

Doctors' Commons, January 16, 1855.

My Lord,

Contraband of war supplied to Russia through Prussia.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th December last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Berlin, calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the facilities existing for the transit to Russia through the Prussian dominions of lead and other articles contraband of war, and referring to the prohibition to export horses from Prussia recently issued by the Prussian Government; and to request that I would take these despatches into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether, in my opinion, Her Majesty's Government should address any application to the Government of Prussia, founded on our rights as belligerents, against the transit of warlike stores through Prussia to an enemy.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th instant in reference to the above, and transmitting a further despatch on the same subject, which has been received from Lord Bloomfield.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatches into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Her Majesty's Government may remonstrate, if such transit is illegal in Prussia.

That I must assume the entire absence of any Treaty stipulation on the subject; on this assumption I am of opinion that Her Majesty's Government will be entitled to address a formal application to the Government of Prussia, founded on Her Majesty's rights as a belligerent, against the transit of warlike stores through Prussia to the enemy, only in the event of such transit as is alluded to being illegal in Prussia, and the law of Prussia being, nevertheless, easily and constantly evaded. If this be really so, as I understand Lord Bloomfield to state, and if "all kinds of articles for warlike purposes are continually finding their way through Prussia," in evasion or violation of the law of that country, the Prussian Government may, in my opinion, be fairly called upon by Her Majesty's Government as a belligerent to enforce the Prussian law, both in letter and in spirit, and to take every reasonable precaution against its being violated or evaded.

I would suggest that every effort should be made on behalf of Her Majesty's Government either to put the Prussian law in force, or, at least, to establish judicially that it is systematically violated or evaded, by instituting proceedings, or by giving formal information to the proper authorities, and requiring them to act, or by any other means which may be most available.

If this cannot be successfully done, at all events, definite information may probably be procurable of the dates and names of the persons concerned, the qualities, quantities, and description of the goods, and so forth.

Legal advice should be taken.

I would, however, venture to suggest that the Prussian law and the evidence procurable should be carefully considered under good legal advice, and the other information I have suggested be collected and considered before any formal representation is made to the Prussian Government.

It will not be advisable, in my opinion, to make any application to the Prussian Government without further information, and if it should turn out that no satisfactory proof can be given that any legal offence has been committed in Prussia, or that the Prussian law is not palpably and systematically evaded, the complexion of the case will be much altered.

It does not appear to me that any argument can be fairly founded upon the recent prohibition of the exportation of horses from Prussia. Her Majesty's Government, as a belligerent, cannot justly complain of it, and the Prussian Government appears to have had some financial and commercial reasons for the measure quite independent of the existing war, reasons which would not apply to warlike stores.

As to capture of vessels on their way to Prussia.

I may, perhaps, in conclusion, suggest that information as to the ships bringing these articles into Prussia might be useful, as, if the real destination of the articles should be hostile, the capture of such vessels may be justifiable. I presume that, having regard to the probable transit of contraband of war by sea to Russia, and to other matters, a sufficient force of Her Majesty's ships of war are still in the harbours or upon the coasts of Prussia (if they continue open), so that any particular ship might be searched, detained, or captured, according to circumstances. An intimation that all vessels bound to Prussian ports would be strictly searched for contraband of war, unless some more stringent measures were taken in this matter by the Prussian Government, may not improbably be advisable (sic).

Doctors' Commons, January 17, 1855.

My Lord,

Russian Ukase prohibiting export of grain from Odessa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Edmond of Aberdeen, inquiring whether there is any official evidence in the Foreign Department of the Russian Ukase prohibiting the exportation of corn or bread-stuffs from Odessa in the month of March last, to which a subject of this country could have recourse in a civil question with another subject; and requesting that, if there is such evidence, to be furnished with the particulars, if that can be done with propriety.

Mr. Hammond states that he is further directed to transmit to me a draft of the answer which your Lordship proposes to return to Mr. Edmond's application; together with three despatches from Mr. Yeames, late Her Majesty's Consul at Odessa, upon which that answer is founded; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Not expedient to answer Mr. Edmond's question.

That I am not aware of the position which Mr. Edmond of Aberdeen holds either in Her Majesty's service, or otherwise, or of his occupation or business. I am, therefore, in the absence of any information on these points, unable to form any opinion as to whether he is fairly entitled to be supplied with particular official information by your Lordship from the papers in the Foreign Office, in order that he may make use of it, as he states, "in a civil question with another subject." It is to be remarked that he does not even state that he is individually interested in this "civil question," or, how the "civil question" has arisen—whether in the shape of a civil suit, or of a wager, time bargain on the Stock Exchange, or otherwise. Under these circumstances I certainly cannot advise your Lordship to give him any answer whatsoever. Assuming, however, that your Lordship is satisfied upon these points, and should decide upon giving him any information, I would respectfully venture to submit the inexpediency of disclosing to him, or to any other applicant, the precise amount of the information in your Lordship's possession on this subject, or the exact source from which it has been derived. The adoption of such a course would appear to me to be objectionable, and likely to induce further applications, and possibly to end in summoning your Lordship, or some of the gentlemen in Her Majesty's service, to give evidence before a legal Tribunal on the subject, which is not desirable.

It appears to me that there is really no "official evidence in the Foreign Department of the Russian Ukase" in question; and that if there be any such evidence, it will be more prudent not to disclose it.

Mr. Yeames does not appear to have forwarded any authenticated copy of the Ukase, or even to have seen one. If, therefore, Mr. Edmond is to receive any answer at all (a question which I must leave to your Lordship's decision), I would venture to suggest that it should be to the effect that your Lordship is unable to give any further information upon the subject than that you have good reason to believe that some official order was issued in March last by the Russian Government, to the effect suggested.

Capture of Dutch vessel "Wilmina."

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th December last, stating that with reference to our report of the 11th August last,* upon the capture of the Netherland vessel "Wilmina" by Her Majesty's ship "Archer," he was directed to transmit to us, together with the previous correspondence which has passed on this subject, a note from the Netherland Minister at this Court, demanding compensation on behalf of the owners of the "Wilmina" for the losses they sustained in consequence of the detention of that vessel at Pillau from the 19th of July to the 25th of August last, and to request that we would take the inclosed papers into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the course which it would be proper for Her Majesty's Government to pursue with regard to the claim now advanced by Baron Bentinck in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Her Majesty's Government should pay compensation for wrongful detention.

That it appears to us to follow from our previous Report that some reasonable compensation is due to the owners of this vessel for her wrongful detention.

The compensation demanded in the shape of demurrage appears to us to be unobjectionable in principle and moderate in amount, and we are of opinion that the claim advanced by Baron Bentinck should not be resisted by Her Majesty's Government.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received January 20.)

My Lord,

Blockade of the Danube.

As to relaxations in favour of neutral ports.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 9th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note, dated January 8, 1855, which has been received from the Austrian Minister at this Court, inclosing a Memorandum pointing out the injury inflicted on the trade of the countries bordering on the River Danube by the blockade of the mouths of that river, and suggesting a plan by which the general trade of Europe might be relieved from the restrictions imposed upon it by the blockade without any facilities being given to the trade of Russia, and to request that I would take Count Colloredo's note, and its inclosure, into consideration and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the note in question, so far as it alludes to the blockade of the Danube inflicting no loss or injury upon Russia, but rather conferring a benefit upon that Power, raises a question either of fact, opinion, or political economy, rather than of law, which is beyond my province.

I confess that the ingenious observations upon that question contained therein have failed to convince me that the blockade has not caused, and will not cause, serious injury to Russia, although it doubtless may also injure the commercial interests of neutrals, and even those of the subjects of the Allies. The raising of the whole blockade simpliciter may be advisable, and will of course be legal.

The events of the war have caused, and are constantly causing, such great changes in the actual occupation and national character of the various countries and places on the banks of the Danube, that it is impossible for me, without much fuller information than I at present possess, to advise with much confidence as to the best course to be pursued with a view of partially relaxing the existing blockade in favour of the fluvial ports of countries not in Russian occupation. All partial relaxations of blockade are attended with more or less legal risk of invalidating the whole blockade.

* No. 168.

I observe that doubts are suggested in the early part of the notes as to the legality of the blockade of the Danube so far as relates to the neutral territories and ports upon its shores, and these doubts are not, in my opinion, wholly unfounded, although authority preponderates in favour of the validity of the entire blockade both as regards the enemy's ports and other ports on the river.

Recommends issue of licences.

The object in view might, in my opinion, be safely attained by the issuing of licenses under the Sign-Manual, which would, legally speaking, be the safest course. Such licenses might be issued on the terms or with the precautions which might be most advisable according to circumstances in each particular case.

No system, such as suggested in the note, of issuing passes not amounting to licenses, and yet maintaining the blockade as against all vessels not provided therewith, will be legally safe.

My Lord,

Case of the "Steen Bille."

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th instant (which only reached me yesterday morning) in which his Lordship calls my attention to two passages marked in the accompanying Report of the "Times" newspaper of my observations in the case of the "Steen Bille" in the Admiralty Court on the 12th instant, and requests that I will inform your Lordship whether this report is correct. A copy of the "Times" of January 13 (?) accompanies his Lordship's letter.

His remarks in Admiralty Court respecting Denmark and the Danish Minister.

I beg to state that the two passages marked therein are a substantially correct report of what I said, with the exception that the word "not" occurring before the word "obtained" in the first passage should be omitted. My observation was "that the claimant had obtained the assistance of the Danish Legation."

Neither of these particular passages, however, nor my other observations in the cause are intelligible without reference to the depositions, affidavits, and other documents exhibited and referred to therein (but not given in the report) and also to the conduct of the cause on behalf of the claimant, as well as to the arguments and observations of his counsel, to which mine were a reply.

I shall of course be ready at any time to offer any explanation upon the whole matter which your Lordship may desire.

Inclosure in No. 250.

Extract from the "Times" of January 13, 1855.

Passage extracted from the Observations of the Queen's Advocate in the case of the "Steen Bille," before the Admiralty Court, January 12, 1855.

Report of Queen's Advocate's speech

THAT led him (the Queen's Advocate) to a subject of primary importance in this case, namely, whether the XVIth Article of the Treaty of 1670 was in operation or not. He had offered the fairest test by agreeing to admit a certificate from the Danish Legation, but the offer had not been accepted. That fixed bad faith on the whole case. The Danish Legation were doing in Doctors' Commons what they would not do in Downing Street. If Count Reventlow Criminil had given the certificate which he had done in this case, accompanying the Article of the Treaty, and knew that that Treaty was not in force, his cheek might well assume the colour of the Danish national flag. Either the Treaty was in existence, and the "Steen Bille" had been seized in flagrant violation of it, or it was not. The claimant had not obtained the assistance of the Danish Legation to set it up. Unless the matter could be satisfactorily explained, suspicion must attach to every document issued by that Legation. In every case that came before the Court, words indicating Danish property must be branded on every Danish ship. Were they not to have Danish faith and Danish truth if there were such words in the Danish language? If Count Reventlow Criminil knew that the Article in question was not in force, he was bound not to let the Proctor's clerk, to whom it was given, be misled. The certificate produced from the merchants at Copenhagen, alleging that they had never heard of the blockade as a matter of rumour up to June was one of the most disgraceful documents ever produced in a Court of Justice. If that statement were true, the captors were very much out of Court as to notoriety; if false, what became of the case?

Blockade of Baltic. When known in Denmark.

I AM honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 20th January instant, stating that with reference to the letters from the Foreign Office of the 30th December last and 9th January instant, inclosing despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen relative to the time at which the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic was known in Denmark, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit, for my information, a further despatch on the same subject which has been received from Mr. Buchanan.

With reference to the above despatch, I have the honour to report—

Dates wanting.

That, inasmuch as the list of vessels furnished by the Danish Government (and herewith returned) contains neither the date when each of the vessels in question was warned off by Her Majesty's ships, nor the date when this fact was in each case first known in Denmark, nor the date when each vessel first returned to a Danish port after having been warned off, the list is of no utility.

Had these dates been supplied, it might have been a document of great importance and advantage to Her Majesty's Government, and I request that some attempt may be made even now to supply these dates.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 23, 1855.

Blockade of Danube. France contends that a blockade may be partial.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th January instant, stating that on the 9th January Lord Wodehouse forwarded for my opinion a note and a Memorandum* from the Austrian Minister at this Court on the subject of the blockade of the mouths of the Danube. His Lordship transmits to me a note which has been received from the French Ambassador at this Court, contending in support of the Austrian Memorandum that a blockade may be partial, and urging on the consideration of Her Majesty's Government the expediency of the mouths of the Danube being only partially blockaded, and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take Count Walewski's note, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That not being favoured with any indication of the views or opinions of Her Majesty's Government as to the commercial, military, or political aspect of this very delicate and peculiar question, I confine myself altogether to the legal points involved therein.

Suggests giving over Danube blockade to the French.

I would venture, however, respectfully to suggest one mode of practically solving the difficulty (which, indeed, is so obvious that I presume there exist some insuperable obstacles against its adoption)—I allude to the expediency of withdrawing the British naval force employed in this particular blockade, and leaving the maintenance of the blockade of the Danube entirely to Her Majesty's allies, who may admit those relaxations which circumstances may appear to them to require. I would further observe that the British Prize Courts being entirely independent of the influence and control of Her Majesty's Government, present a peculiar obstacle to such legal experiments as those suggested, which do not exist to the same extent elsewhere, and of the operation and effect of which it is difficult to convince foreign Governments, which are in the habit of (erroneously) assuming that Her Majesty's Government can do as it thinks fit in such cases as the present.

Her Majesty's Government cannot control Prize Courts.

Blockade may be limited to Kilia branch if it can be isolated.

The question of the blockade of the Danube (as I have already observed) is one of so local a nature, and so much affected by the frequent changes caused by military and political circumstances now taking place upon its banks, that it is fraught with considerable difficulty, especially as I am in complete ignorance of the actually existing state of military and political affairs on the river; assuming, however (as Count Walewski states), that the "Kilia branch from Reni to the sea" is all that Russia occupies, and further assuming (what is not stated) that the allies have the means of completely closing against all vessels the interior or upper extremity of all the other mouths or arms of the Danube, so as to prevent all internal communication by water on the part of vessels entering the other mouths with the Kilia branch, or with any part of the country in Russian occupation, then I am of opinion that the limiting of the blockade to the Kilia mouth will be legal, as long as this state of circumstances continues.

I do not, however, recommend Her Majesty's Government to attempt any such measure if any other course can be followed, owing to my opinion of the inexpediency of raising these questions against neutrals in British Prize Courts.

Suggest issue of licences.

I would, of course, further advert to the possibility of issuing licenses, adverted to in my report of the 18th January; a measure which will not only be free from legal objections, but has the great practical advantage of adaptability to the circumstances of each case as and when it may arise, and also of maintaining a complete check and control over the traffic, and insuring full information as to what is really being done by the merchants and others concerned.

No. 253.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received January 24.)

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 23, 1855.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from Messrs. C. and A. Giles, requesting to be informed of the state of the English law with regard to the purchase and employment of Russian vessels under the circumstances stated by them; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned to Messrs. Giles.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That although now somewhat familiar with the extravagant ideas which various individuals are in the habit of forming of the extent of your Lordship's official duty and inclination to answer all sorts of questions, I own that I am somewhat surprized by the letter of Messrs. C. and A. Giles.

Questions as to purchase of enemy's ships.

These gentlemen gravely submit to your Lordship three somewhat abstruse legal questions touching the purchase of a Russian ship on behalf of a person whom they simply describe as a "correspondent" of their "house in Hanover." They do not state his name, his national character, or his occupation. I must own to some doubts as to his bonâ fide existence and character. It is by no means impossible that some hostile interest may be at the bottom of the whole scheme.

These questions (to which an answer might be obtained from any advocate in Doctors' Commons upon a full statement of all the circumstances of the case, and upon the payment of a moderate fee) the applicants conceive themselves entitled to put to your Lordship without any statement of the facts, circumstances, dates, or names, in order that they may obtain an official answer at the public expense.

1853-56

Inexpedient to answer.

I cannot too strongly express my opinion as to the inexpediency of giving them any answer at all.

This, however, is a matter entirely for your Lordship's consideration, and having frankly stated my view of the character of the application, I proceed to answer the questions:—

1. "Whether, according to the English laws, he may safely buy and navigate a Russian ship which during last summer lay in a neutral port?"

Legal, if bonâ fide.

Answer. He may do so, provided the purchase is complete and made optimâ fide, and without any reservation of hostile interest. Such purchase being always open to suspicion, whatever may be the real facts, the vessel may be exposed to capture or seizure and to proceedings in the Prize Court; it does not follow that, if restored, any costs or damages would be decreed.

2. "If our laws permit the free navigation of a Russian vessel sold under legal process for liquidation of debt?"

Answer. Yes, subject to the same qualification.

3. "Whether the purchase of an enemy's ship which has been stranded and sold would thereby be protected?"

Answer. Yes, subject as above.

Fraudulent transfer of Russian and Greek vessels to Ionian flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th January instant, stating that in my letter of the 20th October last[*] I concurred in the instructions which the Duke of Newcastle proposed to give to the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands to take such measures as he might think best calculated to put a stop to the fraudulent assumption of the Ionian flag by Greek and Russian vessels, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the War Department, inclosing a despatch from Sir Henry Ward, detailing the measures which he thinks best adapted for putting a stop to the abuse in question; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether, in my opinion, there exists any objection to Her Majesty's Government issuing the orders to Her Majesty's Consuls, and to the Commanders of Her Majesty's ships-of-war, as suggested by Sir Henry Ward.

Mr. Hammond likewise incloses the former papers, which are herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I request that my report of the 20th October last on this matter may be referred to, in connection with that of the Law Officers of the 25th July upon the same subject.

It does not appear to me that I have therein expressed my opinion in favour of the Lord High Commissioner being authorized to take "such measures as he might think best calculated to put a stop to the fraudulent assumption of the Ionian flag by Greek and Russian vessels." It is obvious that the fraudulent assumption of the Ionian flag by a Greek (or neutral) vessel is quite a different thing from the assumption of it by a Russian or enemy's vessel, but the best remedy for the evil complained of in either case is only to be found, as I believe, in the alteration of the Ionian law, as I have already pointed out in my previous report of the 20th October.

Ionian law should be altered.

The two measures suggested by Sir Henry Ward are of a very different character—

First. The Ionian Law, as I understand the matter, is to remain unaltered.

Secondly. The Lord High Commissioner is to exercise a large discretionary power under the limitations pointed out in the Law Officers' report of the 25th July, 1854,[†] and to my separate report of the 20th October, 1854.

Thirdly. New and special orders are now proposed to be issued by Her Majesty's Government to Consuls and to naval officers on the subject of Ionian vessels. I shall confine my attention to the newly suggested orders.

[†] No. 155.

I am not, with reference to the proposed orders to Her Majesty's Consuls, sufficiently informed of the exact state of the Ionian Law as to the property in, and the papers required by, Ionian ships, to judge of the propriety of giving the proposed "stringent order" to Her Majesty's Consuls "to give no passes to unregistered Ionian vessels except to the Island to which they belong. As far as I understand the matter, I can see nothing illegal in the issuing of such an order, which appears to me justifiable under the circumstances stated. I cannot, of course, foresee its practical result upon Ionian commercial interests. Some reasonable notice should be given of the issuing of such an order, so that Ionians may not be taken by surprise, considerable laxity having hitherto been tolerated in this matter, and the opinion of the Law Officers of the Ionian Government should be obtained.

Consuls to refuse passes, &c.

Her Majesty's Consuls will have, I presume, been instructed to exercise the utmost vigilance to secure the capture or seizure of all vessels suspected to be Russian, whether sailing under British, Ionian, or any other flags or papers. I fear that a large number of fraudulent cases of assumption by Russians of neutral flags pass without notice or detection in foreign ports.

Her Majesty's ships not justified in capturing, in all cases.

The Commanders of Her Majesty's ships-of-war will be justified in visiting all vessels under the Ionian flag, and reporting any circumstances relating to them which they may be ordered to report; but they will not be justified in capturing ships under the Ionian flag, unless there may exist a reasonable suspicion in each particular case of the vessel being in fact enemy's property. I cannot advise the issuing of any new orders to them as to Ionian vessels.

I am, therefore, of opinion, as at present advised,—

1. That the orders suggested may be issued to Consuls, if your Lordship considers it expedient to issue them.

2. That the orders suggested cannot properly be issued to the Commanders of Her Majesty's ships.

I have, &c.

Supplies from the Danube for French forces in Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of this day's date, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 18th instant, inclosing a letter from the French Ambassador at this Court respecting the blockade of the Danube, and with reference also to his previous letter of the instant and to my Report of the instant,[*] respecting the wish of the French Government to draw supplies from the Danube for the use of the French forces in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me therewith a further letter from the French Ambassador on those matters, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon at my earliest convenience, as your Lordship is anxious to return an answer to Count Walewski as soon as possible.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That with especial reference to my Report of the 9th January, I must beg to observe that I am still without the particular information as to facts alluded to therein.

Count Walewski's note of the 22nd January, however able and forcible, does not contain any definite statement of any of those facts. His Excellency, as I understand the purport of his note, makes two distinct proposals:—

As to blockade of Kilia mouth of Danube only.

1st. He again urges the expediency of raising the blockade of all the mouths of the Danube excepting the Kilia mouth, and opening all those mouths generally, and without exception, to the commerce of all the world.

My Report of the 22nd (sent herewith, and to which I have nothing at present to add) deals with this question.

Imperial licences would not vitiate the blockade.

2nd. Count Walewski proposes (at the end of his note) that the French Government should, instead of the passes of an intendant previously adverted to, issue licenses under the Imperial authority, and, I presume, in the form hitherto always used in France in such instruments. I am of opinion that the permitting vessels furnished with such licenses to pass would not vitiate the blockade.

As to passes. Her Majesty's Government cannot control decisions of Prize Courts.

I observe, however, that Count Walewski urges upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of "covering with a common responsibility the measures which the commanding officers of the allied armies and fleets have adopted;" I assume, therefore, that the measure in question, viz., permitting access to vessels furnished with passes only, has been carried into effect, and is in actual operation, and in reference thereto I can only repeat that it is not Her Majesty's Government but the British Prize Courts which have here the power of deciding on the validity of blockades, and that it is a maxim of those courts that a blockade imposed for the purpose of obtaining a commercial monopoly for the private advantage of the state which lays on such blockade is illegal and void on the very principle on which it is founded.

Blockade illegal if reserving monopoly of trade to blockading Power.

This is, I apprehend, precisely what the allied commanders propose to effect by these passes, and the urgency of the wants of the state will not, in my opinion, affect the question legally.

Danube should be blockaded by France and Turkey only.

I will only add, in conclusion, that Count Walewski's note of the 22nd January impresses me more than ever with the advantage which would result in the present critical and complicated state of this matter from leaving the blockade of the Danube in the hands of France, or France and Turkey exclusively.

Detention of Russian letters by Postmaster at Hong Kong.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of September 23 last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the Board of Treasury calling attention to the proceedings of the Postmaster at Hong Kong in detaining letters addressed to Russian subjects, passing through the post-office at Hong Kong; and to request that we would take this letter and its inclosures into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion on the subject to which they relate.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Illegal unless an Ordinance is passed.

That the Governor had no power to direct the Postmaster to detain, and deliver to him, letters addressed to persons in the Colony; and that such an order as was issued by the Governor would not be an indemnity to the Postmaster on proceedings being instituted against him in consequence thereof.

If it is deemed expedient that such a power should exist in the Colony, an Ordinance should be passed conferring on the Governor powers with reference to the detention of letters, similar to those possessed by a Secretary of State in Great Britain under 1 Vict. ch. 36.

Black Sea blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th instant, stating that with reference to my report of the 10th instant,[*] he was directed to transmit to me a despatch and its inclosures, received from Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, respecting a correspondence which has passed between his Excellency and Vice-Admiral Dundas concerning the blockade of Russian ports in the Black Sea.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Joint notification of British and French Admirals.

That the particular document to which I apprehend my attention is meant to be directed, is the so-called notification in French signed by Admirals Dundas and Hamelin, dated "En route de Kamiesh, Décembre 12, 1854," which I presume has been duly published. I observe that it commences "Au nom des Gouvernements de France et de la Grande Bretagne, nous soussignés commandants des forces navales alliées dans la Mer Noire, conformément aux instructions que nous avons reçues de nos Gouvernements respectifs, donnons avis, &c."

As to Eupatoria and Balaklava.

I observe that it announces an intention to blockade Eupatoria and Balaklava, against which I have already stated my objections.

---

[*] No. 241.

1853-56

In the absence of any knowledge or information as to the particular instructions which the Admirals, either or each of them, may have received in this matter, it is difficult for me to offer any very confident or relevant observations on this document, as to the form and publication of which I do not find that the Admirals previously secured the advice and concurrence of the Ambassadors of their respective States at Constantinople.

The document, however, has been issued, and cannot well be revoked or annulled, especially after the publication of the letter from the Secretary of the Admiralty to the Secretary of Lloyds, dated January 10, 1854, upon which I had no official communication with the Admiralty or your Lordship, and which I have only seen in the newspapers.

It is to be hoped that the mischief which might ensue as to Eupatoria and Balaklava from rumours of an impending blockade of those ports has been guarded against, and there may be some special grounds (with which I am unacquainted) for hoping that the notification in question will at least do no harm.

I can only say that I am not aware of any precedent for such a document, excepting in the case of Sir Charles Napier's letter to Mr. Buchanan from Kioge Bay last year, upon which I reported adversely on April 20, 1854.

Difficulties may arise in Prize Courts from announcement of simultaneous blockade of all ports.

I cannot undertake to say that this notification will not give rise to difficulties hereafter with neutrals, especially in the Prize Courts. Circumstances, for instance, may prevent the Admirals from carrying their intentions therein announced of blockading on one and the same day, according to the alleged instructions of their Governments, all the Russian coast of the Black Sea. Neutrals may complain of being misled by it, or otherwise hereafter use it to throw doubts on the legal validity or notoriety of the blockade consequent thereon. I must frankly state that as I am in total ignorance of the real object proposed to be attained by the publication of the document, I cannot express any opinion as to its practical results hereafter, and, as at present advised, I can only regret that it was published.

It will not legally operate as a notice or notification of blockade, or bind neutrals so as to expose their ships or goods to confiscation for disregarding it.

Notice of de facto blockade will be necessary.

A subsequent and distinct notice from some competent authority of the actual existence of a de facto blockade, and also the publication of a formal notification in the "Gazette," on behalf of Her Majesty's Government will be necessary; of this Lord Stratford appears to be aware.

I beg to call attention to my Confidential Memorandum on blockade printed by the Admiralty for the use of Naval officers, and to impress upon all concerned the necessity (therein adverted to) of a competent force so stationed as to close each and every port meant to be blockaded.

I also beg leave to refer to my report of April 20, 1854, on Sir Charles Napier's letter to Mr. Buchanan as well as to my other reports, especially December 5, 1854, and January 10, 1855,* as to the particular blockade now in question.

Doctors' Commons, January 27, 1855.

My Lord,

His remarks about Denmark and the Danish Minister, in Prize Court.

Case of the "Steen Bille."

I AM honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 24th January, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 18th January,† which stated that the passages occuring in the report of the "Times" newspaper of my observations in the case of the "Steen Bille," recently tried in the Admiralty Court, to which my attention was called in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th January, were substantially correct, and offering to furnish any further explanations which might be desired, his Lordship was directed by your Lordship to state that you would be glad to receive the further observations offered by me, as your Lordship read, with much regret, my remarks, which, coming from an officer holding my high position, are calculated to give offence to the Government of a country in alliance with Her Majesty, and which your Lordship knows have given pain to the gentlemen specially mentioned by me. Those remarks, as far as your Lordship's information upon the case permits you to judge, appear to be characterized by unnecessary harshness.

---

* Nos. 77, 226, and 241.

† No. 250.

I accordingly proceed to offer some explanation of the circumstances which gave me an impression that the Danish Legation, having intervened in the case of the "Steen Bille," had not therein shown that perfect good faith and candour which is always looked for in judicial proceedings at the hands of the Representatives of foreign Governments in international questions.

I offer this explanation in obedience to your Lordship's intimation and in justice to myself, but without any expectation of altering the adverse impression of my conduct which your Lordship has already been pleased to form and to express.

Explanation of facts of the case.

Treaty of 1670.

The "Steen Bille" was captured in the Baltic on the 25th May for breach of blockade; proceedings were instituted against her July 18; a claim was given in on the 7th August, and her case was discussed in common with others and "further proof" ordered therein by the Court on the 30th August. It is not a little remarkable, and scarcely consistent with perfect international candour and fair dealing, that the Danish Legation did not, as far as I am aware, either to your Lordship or to the Prize Court, insist upon or even allude to the existence or relevancy of the Treaty of 1670 at this or any previous time, or until the case came on for "further proof" in this month, when amongst the proofs brought in against the Crown by the claimant was the affidavit annexed. A slightly different affidavit was also given in the case of the "Francisca."

The effect of these affidavits standing might have been fatal to the case of the Crown, and it was my duty and my object to get rid of them or to diminish their effect by every lawful means. It is submitted to your Lordship, confidently, that Count Reventlow must well have known the use which was intended to have been made of these documents.

The claimant's counsel insisted upon them as decisive in his favour, and charged Her Majesty's Government with deliberate breach of Treaty. I pointed out that the conduct of Denmark in acceding to the Treaty between Great Britain and Russia in 1801, and in publishing her own Letters Patent of April 20, 1854 (reviving the Ordinance of May 4, 1803), Article 15, to which I request your Lordship's particular attention, and by her silence on the subject of the Treaty of 1670 when the war broke out, and when these Danish vessels were captured for breach of blockade, and up to that moment, was wholly inconsistent with an honest belief in the existence, operation, or binding effect of that Treaty, or of its having any bearing on these cases; and that either the claimant or the Danish Legation was endeavouring to mislead the Court on the subject; but I expressly stated that if the claimant had been properly informed by the Legation, and had, nevertheless, endeavoured to mislead the Court, then the Legation was exonerated from the charge of bad faith which must fall exclusively upon the claimant.

The claimant (be it remembered) had by his counsel repeatedly charged Her Majesty's Government with bad faith, and its officers with perjury, and that claimant was in close communication with the Legation, which was affording him every assistance. I admit that these charges, to some extent, excited me, and influenced the tone and temper of my reply, and I think not unreasonably.

The result of these remarks of mine, and of the offer I made to admit a certificate from the Danish Legation that the XVIth Article of the Treaty of 1670 was still subsisting and in full force, was the subsequent production of the certificate of Baron Oxholm of January 17 (No. 3 annexed). This certificate contains a very singular qualification at the end, which is not, in my opinion, wholly consistent with candour, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, and to the two previous affidavits; and upon this document the claimant's counsel was driven to the argument of "punctuation," and the Court (interposing of its own accord) made some strong and disparaging remarks upon the ambiguous wording of the certificate (see paragraph No. 4, "Times" report annexed).

A perusal of the Certificate No. 3 will at once demonstrate that the Danish Legation felt itself unable seriously to maintain the continued existence and operation upon this case of Article XVI of the Treaty of 1670, notwithstanding its previous unqualified authentications thereof, and the complexion up to that moment endeavoured to be given to the bearing of that Article on the cases of the "Francisca" and "Steen Bille."

The true question after all is, not whether there was in fact any bad faith in any quarter, but whether I was not justified at the time and under the circumstances (and before I had seen the qualified certificate of Baron Oxholm) in making the observations in question upon the Legation, which had furnished the claimant with the unqualified documents (Nos. 1 and 2), on which he relied to convict the Crown of bad faith. At the same time I placed myself unreservedly in the hands of the Court on this point, and I expressly stated (on the earliest opportunity) that, if the Court was of opinion that I had said anything which I ought not to have said, I would be the first to apologize, upon which the Court made no remark. (See paragraph No. 6, "Times" report of the "Nornen," January 19, annexed.)

I feel persuaded that, had it not been for my strenuous and perhaps too forcible resistance, the device might have succeeded. I could have no personal feeling in the matter. It would have been far more easy and agreeable for me not to have pressed the point, but to have left the Legation and its documents unmolested. In case of success, I felt certain that I should receive no official approbation; in case of failure I well knew I should run the risk of official censure, and be exposed to all the complaints which the Danish Legation could induce your Lordship to listen to. My only object and motive was to do my duty as Counsel for the Crown at all hazards.

I cannot conclude without respectfully but most firmly submitting to your Lordship that, in the discharge of a most arduous public and professional duty, conducted under disadvantages so serious as to have been pointedly adverted to by the Court, my remarks did not (all things considered) exceed the limits of that professional freedom always hitherto conceded to English advocates, and which was not checked in this case by a Court sitting to administer international law, and which would not have silently tolerated any excess; a Court before which I must be excused for stating that I have practised for eighteen years without ever receiving a rebuke for making too severe remarks upon any individual.

With reference to your Lordship's observation that my remarks have given pain to Count Reventlow, I have no hesitation in expressing my regret for having caused pain to a gentleman towards whom I had not the slightest personal feeling, and of whom I had no personal knowledge.

I have, &c.

(Translation from the Latin.)

ARTICLE XVI.

IT shall be lawful for either of the Confederates and their subjects or people to trade with the enemies of the other, and to carry to them, or furnish them with, any merchandizes (prohibited only, which they call contraband excepted) without any impediment, unless in ports and places besieged by the other, which, nevertheless, if they shall so do, it shall be free for them either to sell their goods to the besiegers or betake themselves to any other port or place not besieged.

ARTICLE XXXIII.

But if also in the ships taken by the subjects of either Confederate and brought into any port belonging to the other, there be found any seamen or other person who are subjects of that Confederate into whose ports or rivers the prize shall be brought, they shall be civilly used by those who have taken them, and restored to their liberty forthwith and without ransom.

ARTICLE XXXV.

And for the greater security of the subjects of both Kings, and for preventing all violence towards them from the said ships of war, all commanders of any of the ships of war belonging to the King of Great Britain, and all other his subjects whatsoever, shall be strictly charged and required that they do not molest or injure the subjects of the King of Denmark, if they shall do otherwise they shall be liable to answer it in their persons and estates, and shall therein stand bound until just satisfaction and compensation shall be made for the wrongs by them done and the damage thereby sustained or to be sustained; in like manner, shall all commanders of the ships of war belonging to the King of Denmark, and all other his subjects whatsoever, be straightly under the same penalties charged and required that they do not molest or injure the said subjects of the King of Great Britain: provided, nevertheless, that all the aforesaid action be examined and adjudged by due and legal proceeding in the Court of Admiralty of both Kings, or if it shall rather seem meet to either of the parties, being a stranger in the place where the controversy is to be decided, they shall be examined before certain Commissioners, which both Kings, as soon as they shall be desired, shall appoint to that end, that so proceedings by this means may be not only carried on without great expenses but also ended within three months at farthest.

ADMIRALTY PRIZE COURT.

The "Steen Bille," Peter Hansen Beck, Master.

Appeared personally, William May the younger, of Catherine Court, Tower Hill, in the County of Middlesex, Ship and Insurance Agent, and made oath as follows:—

I am the agent for the owners of the above-named Danish vessel "Steen Bille," which has been detained by Her Britannic Majesty's steam-ship of war "Conflict," and sent to this country for adjudication in the Admiralty Prize Court on a charge of attempting to commit a breach of blockade of the Russian Baltic ports. On the 7th instant, I received from Alfred Frantz Carl, Count of Reventlou-Criminel, late the Chargé d'Affaires of His Danish Majesty the King of Denmark at the Court of St. James, but now Secretary to the Danish Legation in London, the document hereto annexed, and marked with the letter (A), being a copy of the XVIth, XXXIIIrd, and XXXVth Articles of a Treaty entered into on the 11th of July, 1670, between their Majesties Christian the Vth, King of Denmark and Norway, and Charles the IInd, King of Great Britain; and I lastly make oath that I believe the same to be a true and genuine copy of the said three Articles of the above-mentioned Treaty, inasmuch as the said Alfred Frantz Carl, Count of Reventlou-Criminel, has attached or set his signature at the foot or end of the said copy in verification thereof, and the Exhibit (B) to be a true translation thereof.

Certificate.

AT the request of Captain Beck, of the "Steen Bille," Danish schooner, it is hereby certified that His Danish Majesty's Government considers the Treaty of Alliance and Commerce between the Crowns of Denmark and Great Britain of the 11th July, 1670, as being still in force, as well with regard to the XVIth Article of the same as to every other part of it which has not been expressly changed or modified by subsequent Treaties.

Royal Danish Legation, London, January 17, 1855.

(Signed) W. OXHOLM,
His Danish Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary.

Inclosure 4 in No. 259.

Extract from the "Times" of January 19, 1855.

THE "NORNEN."

Dr. Twiss.—THE master said that the officer spoke to him in English; and the fair and candid interpretation was that he was on board an English ship of war. It was not necessary that the information should have been given by the squadron; it was sufficient if the vessel was an English man-of-war. There was a passage in Chancellor Kent's "Commentaries," vol. i, part i, section vii, p. 149, directly in favour of the "Nornen." He would now come to the question of the Treaty privileges. He must first refer, in order that they might be under no mistake, to the Danish Treaty of 1670, to a certificate which had now been brought in in the case of the "Steen Bille," from the Danish Legation, and which was to the following effect:—

"At the request of Captain Beck, of the 'Steen Bille,' Danish schooner, it is hereby certified that His Danish Majesty's Government considers the Treaty of Alliance and Commerce between the Crowns of Denmark and Great Britain, of the 11th of July, 1670, as being still in force, as well with regard to the XVIth Article of the same as to every other part of it which has not been expressly changed or modified by subsequent Treaties."

If that certificate was going to be disputed—

The Queen's Advocate.—The certificate was not going to be disputed. It stated that the XVIth Article was in force, in the opinion of the Danish Government, only so far as it had not been expressly changed or modified by subsequent Treaties. That was begging the whole question. It had been modified by the accession of Russia in 1803, and he contended that it had been modified by the subsequent Danish Law of 1854, reviving the Law of 1803, which Law of 1803 had been withheld from the Court, while the Law of 1854 was handed up to it.

Dr. Twiss must contend, as at present instructed, for what he held to be the legitimate purport of that certificate. If the punctuation was right, it ran thus:—"With regard to the XVIth Article of the same,"—there was a stop,—"as to every other part of it which has not been expressly changed, or modified by subsequent Treaties." If it was contended that that was a mere evasion—

The Court.—Was it not to be lamented, and greatly to be lamented, that, when what was asked for might have been expressed in the most plain, intelligible, and unambiguous terms, it was not done? What he understood was asked for was a certificate from the Danish Government, that the XVIth Article of the Treaty of 1670 was in full force and operation. Two lines would have expressed that idea.

Dr. Twiss had instructed the Proctor to communicate with the Danish Legation, and procure a certificate, to the effect that the Xth Article of 1670 was in force, and that was the certificate which had been sent down. The Court, if that question was before it, should have the application made to the Danish Legation.

The Court.—It was not a question of the application, but of the answer to it. It was to be lamented that the interpretation of it should depend on punctuation in a matter of that grave importance which the Court was called upon to determine.

Dr. Twiss.—If the Court was of opinion that the certificate was not of the purport he stated, another application should be made to the Danish Legation.

The learned Judge said he would treat with the greatest respect any certificate from a foreign Government, but he lamented that the one produced was couched in vague terms, on a subject which admitted of demonstration.

The Queen's Advocate, in reply, said that, first, with regard to the interpolation into this case of a document which belonged to that of the "Steen Bille" he would not complain of it, but in the "Steen Bille" it was everything or nothing. When the learned counsel who led in the case (Dr. Addams) stated that he believed this was the first instance in which the Crown had been permitted to bring in further proof of the existence of the blockade, the Court met him by observing—first, that in nearly one-half the cases in the late war the same thing was done; and, secondly, that allowing further proof was for the advantage of the claimants. The Treaty under which it was now contended that the ship was wrongly seized was withheld from the Court when the matter was discussed on the first occasion. A certificate having now been brought in from the Danish authorities, a preliminary question arose—did the Danish Government mean to say that the XIVth Article of the Treaty of 1670 was in force, or did it mean to admit that it was not in force, or did it mean to say neither one thing nor the other, and leave the claimant on his own responsibility to make what use he could of it? There being nothing to show whether the putting forward of that Treaty was simply the act of the claimant himself, or was suggested or sanctioned by the Danish Legation, which had so far assisted the claimant, certain strong observations were made by him, under those circumstances, upon the Danish Legation for so dealing with the case. If the certificate which had now been brought in had been before the Court when the "Steen Bille" was first argued, these observations would have been unnecessary, and would never have been addressed to the Court. But the result of the observations and the discussion was, that the Court had now before it, for the first time, a most valuable document, from which it appeared that the Danish Government did not mean to contend that the XVIth Article of the Treaty was now in force. He had a right to assume that the Danish Legation told the claimant so when he went before them to get the certified copy of the XVIth Article. There was no ground for supposing it did not, because it had put its own construction upon its own certificate, and, of course, the Legation spoke to the claimant with the same voice, and told him what it now told the Court and the world. He charged upon the claimant the clearest want of good faith. Having notice from the Danish Legation that they did not mean to insist positively that the XVIth Article was in force, the claimant now attempted to use it in a way in which the Legation not only did not sanction it, but, as he read it, they disavowed it and threw the whole responsibility on the claimant. The Danish Government had not set forth, and the claimants had only set forth by the argument of counsel, in what particular parts the Treaty of 1670 had been changed or modified, or in what particular parts it had been abrogated altogether. But Mr. McGregor's compilation of commercial tariffs had been presented to both Houses of Parliament. If Her Most Gracious Majesty was to be bound by everything presented to both Houses of Parliament, she would have a great deal more to answer for than she would be bound to do.

Dr. Twiss inquired whether he was to understand Her Majesty's Advocate to contend that that certificate had no other meaning than that the Treaty was in force only so far as it was not repealed by other Treaties? Did he mean to contend that the certificate of the Danish Legation did not bear out his (Dr. Twiss's) position, that the XVIth Article was in force? He wished the learned Advocate would answer that question categorically. He advised the Proctor to direct the Danish subject to make application to his Legation to certify that the Article was in force, and he understood that the certificate had been given in answer to that application, without any reservation or limitation. He contended, bearing in mind that that was a certificate from a foreign Embassy in the language of this country, that the fair and candid interpretation of it was what he had suggested to the Court, and that the Treaty was in force not merely in reference to that particular Article, but all other Articles not expressly set aside. He inferred from it that the Legation declined to certify merely to that particular Article, lest it should be supposed the other Articles were not in force.

The Court observed that it would have been very easy to guard against that.

Dr. Twiss had no doubt if that certificate was not sufficiently precise and accurate in its terms, that the Danish Legation would grant the necessary certificate.

The Queen's Advocate said that, it having been stated that such certificate had been admitted on another occasion, he instantly offered to admit one in the "Steen Bille," although he had a strict right not to allow anything of the sort. The Court had said that it was much to be lamented that when it was asked for in precise words it had not been so given; two lines would have been sufficient. Whether any other certificate should be given in must depend on the Court. He had been asked to state categorically whether the certificate did not support his learned friend's argument. He contended that it did not; in his opinion it was destructive of it. His learned friend had called upon the Court to express its opinion upon certain observations which he had made. If it did so, it would also listen to some other prayers made on behalf of the claimant's counsel. It had been said that Mr. Lousada's affidavit was false from the beginning to the end; that Mr. Hertslet's was the same; and that those who procured and used Mr. Lousada's affidavit ought to be subjected to the pointed censure of the Court. That was one of the matters with which the Court had to deal. It had been said that the last publication of Sir Charles Napier's despatches was an atrocity which must overwhelm the British Government. It was not Lord Aberdeen, or Lord John Russell, or Sir James Graham, that was to be charged with it; but somebody was, and the Court was entreated and urged to express an opinion upon it. He did not complain of flights of fancy—still, if the Court was to express an opinion it must do so with respect to all of them. Dr. Twiss had spoken of the Baltic ringing with the oppression of the British Government, and inquired whether England was not to be bound by her Treaties? There were other facetious things of which he did not complain; but still, if his sins were to be set before him, other persons must be subjected to the same. When the Court expressed its opinion upon him it must do the same with respect to others. Every word would be listened to by him, and if the Court should be of opinion that he had said anything respecting anyone living which he ought not to have done, he would be the first to apologise. But to come to the facts of the case. It had been said that there could not be a blockade without notification, and that as to the last publication in the "Gazette" that was an atrocity. That was a matter of opinion, but there was the fact—the "Gazette" had notified that the blockade existed from the 17th of April. Certain vessels, it had been said, must be taken to have entered the port of Riga with the permission of the squadron, because it did not appear from the logs that they had been warned off. All the officers swore una voce that they diligently carried out their orders, and their orders were to turn back all ships. They warned all off except one, and that escaped. It had been contended that neutrals were entitled to warning from the blockading squadron, but no cases had been cited in support of it. Ships in port, it was said, were not bound to know of the blockade simply because they saw cruizers. That was an abstract proposition with which he was not concerned to deal. It appeared that five ships had succeeded in getting into Riga, but Captain Key stated that 154 vessels had been warned off—that proved how effective the blockade had been. The "Nornen" failed to show that she was visited by any English ship-of-war in the Baltic. He would not go over the ground again as to the Danish Treaty. It had not been shown that the Swedish Treaty had any reference to vessels coming out of harbour, and, therefore, it could not apply to the case of the "Nornen." The learned Advocate then referred to the various Treaties alluded to by Dr. Twiss, and contended that they afforded no support to the claimant's case.

Dr. Jenner followed on the same side, and submitted that the cases cited, when closely examined, were not decisions from which the "Nornen" could derive any benefit.

The learned Judge said it must now be understood that the argument on the general question was closed. With respect to the other blockade cases he would hear an argument on any distinctive features which they presented for consideration.

Danube blockade.

Proposed raising of.

Doctors' Commons, January 29, 1855.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of January 28 instant, stating that he was directed to state to me that Her Majesty's Government are about to propose to the French Government that the blockade of the Danube should be raised altogether, and accordingly to request that I would prepare a notification of the raising of the blockade to be inserted in the "London Gazette."

Mr. Hammond is pleased to add that your Lordship would be glad to have the draft of such notification in the course of this day, in order that you may communicate it to the French Government previously to its being issued.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I observe that the blockade of the Danube is still maintained, and that it is only intended to propose its being raised. I would venture to suggest that any formal "Gazette" notification is, under such circumstances, premature, and that when the measure is determined upon, orders should be sent to carry it into effect, and an immediate official answer thereto reporting the raising of the blockade required, whereupon a notification may be founded.

I am unable at present to prepare a proper form of notification of the raising of the blockade of the Danube in the absence of any information as to the form or manner in which Her Majesty's Government has received official information that such blockade has been actually raised, and of the date at and from which it was so raised.

1853-56

I have, however, prepared, and herewith transmit, a form of notification which may possibly be available for your Lordship's immediate purpose, and which will at all events serve to point out what is wanting.

I have, &c.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 2.)

Doctors' Commons, January 31, 1855.

My Lord,

Danish Company for purchase of Russian vessels.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of January 18 instant, stating that with reference to my letter of the 13th reporting my opinion upon the despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen relative to the supposed Danish Society for the purchase of Russian vessels, which were inclosed in his letter of the 28th ultimo, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a further despatch on the same subject which has been received from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, and to request that I would report to your Lordship whether there is anything in this despatch to alter the opinion already given in my letter of the 13th.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That the contents of this despatch have, to a certain extent, altered the opinion already given by me in my report of January 13.*

It now appears from the list of the names of the owners, furnished by Mr. Taylor, that there is such a community of interests in at least three of these ships as to give the purchase of each ship from the Russians by the particular persons in question the aspect of being not entirely accidental or in the ordinary course of business. One ship (the "Holger Danske"), since lost, is stated to have been purchased by some of these persons flagrante bello (see Mr. Taylor's letter to Mr. Buchanan, December 29).

Capture would be warrantable under the suspicious circumstances.

The refusal of the Danish Custom-house, when officially applied to by the Consul, to furnish the date or place where the purchase of each was effected, and to state where each ship actually was at the date of her purchase, is, in my opinion, a suspicious circumstance, and although Mr. Taylor does not state where these vessels, or any of them, now are, I consider that the impression of the affair derived by the French Government from its own separate sources of information is now sufficiently corroborated by that furnished to Her Majesty's Government to warrant the issuing orders to seize or capture these vessels, either at all events, or provided their papers or the answers of the Master show any irregularity, or that the purchase of either appears to have been made (say) since March last, as your Lordship may judge best. It is of course impossible for me to undertake to say that the particular vessels in question, or either of them, will be condemned, but I beg to state that very extensive frauds are practised in this matter especially by Danes, and that out of twenty-three ships hitherto seized in British ports on suspicion of being Russians falsely using British or neutral flags, and with false neutral papers, no less than twelve have been so seized under Danish colours and papers, of which twelve Danes only one has as yet established her innocence, whilst four of them have been already condemned (notwithstanding they were furnished with numerous and most formal Danish documents purporting to authenticate their legal bonâ fide purchase by Danish subjects) and a primâ facie case of strong suspicion has been established against four others in which I have a fair expectation of ultimate success on behalf of the Crown, although the legal detection of these ingenious frauds when carried on by regular Danish papers is not easy.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 3.)

Doctors' Commons, February 2, 1855.

My Lord,

His remarks on conduct of Danish Government and Legation before Prize Court.

WITH reference to your Lordship's communications to me, made through Lord Wodehouse, of the 15th and 24th January on the subject of certain observations addressed by me to the Court of Admiralty in the case of the "Steen Bille," reflecting upon the conduct of the Danish Government and of the Danish Legation, and characterizing that conduct as wanting in good faith, and in further corroboration of my answers thereto of the 18th and 27th January,* I have the honour to invite your Lordship's attention to the observations of the Court of Admiralty in the judgment deliver by that Court on January 27 in the case of the "Francisca" (reported in the "Times" of January 29). Amongst the proofs adduced in that case by the claimants and against the Crown was the affidavit of William May, with the documents attached from A to E inclusive.

With reference to the document A, the Court said: "We have been favoured with an argumentative note from the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs which wholly, and, unfortunately, omits to notice the only point in question, viz., from what date had the Danish knowledge of the blockade?"

The Court said with reference to the document E: "That the Queen's Advocate had strongly commented upon the document, but not more strongly than it richly deserved. These gentlemen state (they do not swear, and I am glad to think so) that they had never here (at Copenhagen), not even as a loose rumour, heard that it had been really carried into execution. I hardly know how to treat this document; it requires considerable self-command; it is utterly unworthy of credit; and its arguments are upon a par with its credibility."

I give these expressions from a note I made at the time, and they are in substance to be found reported in the "Times" of January 29:—

Further corroboration of his views.

"The Court could not refrain from noticing a paper emanating from the Merchants' Society of Copenhagen, dated September 25, 1854. It had already been strongly commented upon, but he thought not more strongly than it richly deserved. Those gentlemen had thought fit to state that, having had great interest in observing anything connected with that blockade, they had never heard even the least rumour that it had been carried into execution until June 3. Truth required him openly to declare his opinion that that statement was utterly unworthy of credit. He did not stop to notice their arguments, which were about on a par with the credibility of their facts. Could he believe, on a comparison of all the evidence, that the fact of the blockade was not known at an early period in the month of May?"

Your Lordship will observe that this document was officially procured by the Danish Government, and by it forwarded to its Legation here, where the original remains, and whence the copy was furnished to the claimant for the purpose of being used against the Crown in the Admiralty Court, clothed with all the authority and credit which could officially be given to it by Denmark.

Duplicity of Denmark.

I am not aware whether it has been already transmitted to your Lordship from the Danish Legation. I abstain at present from all comment upon the document, which, notwithstanding its solemn and official character, as sanctioned by the Danish Government and supplied from the Legation (to which circumstances the attention of the Court was particulary called during the argument). The Court, nevertheless, declared that "it required considerable self-command" to speak with patience of it. I respectfully submit that these expressions of the Court tend in a great degree to

My Lord,

Blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st February instant stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a despatch and its inclosures from Sir E. Lyons, relative to the blockade of Russian ports in the Black Sea; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and prepare a proper notification for insertion in the "Gazette," provided I am satisfied with the measures taken to enforce the blockade in question.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the despatch, &c., into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Admiral's notice insufficient.

That I am of opinion that the Notice signed by Admirals Lyons and Bruat, dated "Port of Kamiesh, 15th January," is not a sufficient notification of blockade.

The telegraphic despatch in French (not dated) is obviously not a correct or sufficient notification; it does not describe the ports to be blockaded, or the limits of the blockade. The words used are merely "principaux ports Russes de la Mer Noire."

Under these circumstances I cannot advise the official publication in the "Gazette" of these documents, or of anything founded upon them. I observe that "the notification of Admirals Hamelin and Dundas dated the 12th ultimo (December) is alluded to in Admiral Lyons' letter to the Admiralty of the 16th of January." I presume that this is the document already reported on by me on the 25th January,* to which Report I beg particularly to refer upon this subject.

I also observe that another notice has been given on this subject in the letter from the Secretary to the Admiralty to Lloyds', dated January 10, which has appeared in the newspapers, but not that I am aware of in the "Gazette." It is therefore probable that at least three official documents have already been published on this subject. None of these different documents is a proper notification of blockade, and they all materially differ from each other. I would also beg leave to refer to my Report of the 20th of April, 1854,† on a similar document issued by Sir Charles Napier, and to my Confidential Memorandum on blockade printed by the Admiralty.

Notice of intention to blockade is not legal.

I have, both in that Report and in that Memorandum, explained, as clearly as I could, that a notice of intention to blockade on a future day is not a legal notification of a blockade, and I have endeavoured to point out what is requisite in this respect.

I observe that what I have hitherto done in this matter has proved of no practical utility whatsoever; it has, I presume, either never reached the Admirals, or may not have been understood or attended to by them, and I shall be happy to do anything further which may be suggested to prevent the serious consequences which I have always anticipated, and fruitlessly endeavoured to guard against in this particular matter.

I speak with more confidence on this subject from the recent decision of the Court of Admiralty in the "Francisca" (Baltic blockade), in which the point now in question was discussed at great length both in the argument and in the judgment.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 6.)

Doctors' Commons, February 6, 1855.

My Lord,

Notification of blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 27th January last, stating that he was directed to transmit, for my information, copies of two despatches which have been addressed to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople and to certain of Her Majesty's Consuls, respecting the notification of the blockade of Russian ports in the Black Sea, and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations on this subject, if I should deem it necessary.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Memorandum of Instructions to Consuls.

That, considering the want of familiarity with cases of blockade which, after forty years peace, may be expected to prevail amongst Her Majesty's Consuls, and the difficult position in which many of these may find themselves suddenly placed without any means of speedily obtaining instructions how to act, I have ventured to prepare, by way of suggestion (herewith transmitted), a memorandum or circular which may be wholly or partially adopted, and may be used either in substitution or addition to that issued by Lord Stratford, and to that proposed to be issued by your Lordship, dated January 26th, as your Lordship may think fit.

I have kept in view the various difficulties and errors in this matter which I have observed to prevail in the recent case of the Baltic blockade; and I would venture respectfully to suggest the necessity of causing the consuls to understand that a new and serious duty was imposed upon them, requiring their constant and vigilant attention, and that the absence or delay of strictly official information or instructions on the subject ought not to paralyze their efforts or release them from their responsibility.

Possibly the instructions issued to Her Majesty's Consuls in this matter should be communicated to the French Government in order to secure combined action.

I trust that on this occasion I shall not incur your Lordship's disapprobation or be suspected of a desire to make any charges or insinuations against the efficiency of the Consular body, or any portion of it.

I must request to be favoured from time to time with copies of any instructions issued to Her Majesty's Consuls in this matter.

Memorandum.

Duties of Consuls in publishing fact of a blockade, &c.

A BLOCKADE of the Russian ports in the Black Sea being about to be forthwith established, it becomes the duty of Her Majesty's Consular officers to direct their vigilant attention to the subject of blockade, with which some of them may not have been as yet familiar. It is the peculiar duty of Her Majesty's consuls to take care that when a blockade is established all merchants and masters of ships receive notice of it, so that they cannot plead ignorance or doubt if they subsequently attempt to proceed towards any port blockaded.

As soon as consuls shall receive, from whatsoever official quarter, as, for instance, from any of Her Majesty's legations or naval officers, or from the Government of any of Her Majesty's allies, any notice of the imposition of the blockade in a formal or official shape, it will be their duty to give the utmost publicity to such notice, and especially to take care that the consuls, merchants, and masters of vessels belonging to neutral nations within their consular districts shall be prevented from being able to allege that they were either in ignorance or even in doubt upon the subject. They will carefully keep notes as to whom and the dates when such information is given.

Various false or erroneous reports or rumours on the subject may be expected as "that the blockade is only partial;" "that certain vessels have been permitted to pass in or out;" that various accidents, such as weather, hostile resistance, or other circumstances, have induced the blockading force to withdraw;" "that the blockade has been raised." Consuls will use their discretion in publicly contradicting or warning merchants not to rely upon such reports. A formal notification is not absolutely necessary in blockades; their legal validity will not be affected by the delay or absence of such notification.

It may often occur that a blockade may be well known as a matter of fact, or generally believed as a matter of notoriety, to exist without the consul having received any official notice of it. In such cases the consul will take care that any statement or admission he may make as to not being in possession of official notice (especially when this is in writing) is accompanied with a warning that he knows or believes (as the case may be) that the blockade is nevertheless in force.

It must be borne in mind that as blockade presents a serious obstacle to commercial enterprize, and as great commercial interests are injuriously affected thereby, much ingenuity is often employed by the various persons interested in disputing or denying either its existence or their own knowledge of it, and it is against the successful efforts of such ingenuity that the vigilant exertions of Her Majesty's consuls must be incessantly directed.

Their active and cordial co-operation and correspondence with the Foreign Office, Her Majesty's legations, and Her Majesty's naval officers is expected upon all matters connected with blockade, and they will be prepared to furnish full and correct details, with names and dates of all schemes, having for their object the evasion of any blockade instituted by Her Majesty and her allies.

They will bear in mind that this is a matter affecting the interests and character of Her Majesty's Government, to which consuls, especially those residing in neutral ports, have now a paramount and distinct duty to perform.

If they are at any time in doubt or in want of information on the subject, they will not fail to take the most prompt and certain measures to acquire the necessary information, or to ask for and receive instructions how to act.

Blockade of Odessa and Kertch.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two letters, dated the 3rd February, from the Admiralty, with their inclosures, from Rear-Admiral Sir Edmund Lyons, relative to the blockade of Odessa and Kertch, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may think fit to offer thereupon.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th February, stating that he was directed to transmit, for my information, a copy of a letter, dated February 7, from the Admiralty, inclosing copies of a letter from Rear-Admiral Sir E. Lyons, and its inclosures, reporting the delivery of notifications of blockades in Odessa and Kertch.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Notified by a flag of truce.

That I do not find with the papers any copy of the document called "the Declaration," which was sent on shore at Odessa, under a flag of truce, by Captain Brooke, of Her Majesty's ship "Gladiator," on the 19th January.

If a copy of this document could be supplied, I consider that it will be advisable to publish in the "Gazette" Captain Brooke's letter verbatim, with a copy of the Declaration, and its Address annexed, and also to publish in some shape the fact and date of the Declaration having been sent on shore, and to whom addressed at each of the other ports.

Captain Giffard's letter does not appear to me to be proper for publication in extenso. The last sentence (especially) may throw doubt on the validity of the blockades of Anapa and Kaffa, which cannot be effected by "occasional visits;" but if the fact be so, a notice might be inserted in the "Gazette," appended to Captain Brooke's letter, to this effect:—

Notice for "Gazette."

"Official information has been received at the Admiralty from Captain , of Her Majesty's ship , and Captain , of Her Majesty's ship

, that copies of this Declaration, addressed in each case to , were sent on shore and delivered, under a flag of truce, to a Russian officer as follows, at on the , at on the ."

This, however, will not amount to a notification, or dispense with the necessity for one, whenever the blockade is established (as I have repeatedly explained), and the notice for the "Gazette" will require care and accuracy in each case.

Formalities required by Law of France.

There is, I believe, a material difference between the Prize Law of France and that of England as to what amounts to notice of blockade. The French law requires (as I believe) actual warning by a cruizer, in order to render a neutral liable to confiscation for breaking blockade. Of this, I presume, Sir E. Lyons will be made aware by the French naval officers. Having regard to the different notices as to this blockade already published, and to the fact of all the Russian ports in the Black Sea having remained hitherto unblockaded, it may be advisable to caution Her Majesty's naval officers not to capture any vessels attempting to enter a blockaded port unless they are fully satisfied that she made or persisted in such attempt after she well knew not only that a blockade of that port was likely or was intended, but that it actually was in existence, and in doubtful cases to content themselves with warning the ship off, and endorsing her papers.

I would further suggest that it might be more convenient if all letters relating to blockade were confined to that subject (to the exclusion of all others), with a view to their being published or circulated in extenso if necessary without detriment to Her Majesty's service.

Danish remonstrance against Order in Council respecting blockades.

I AM honoured with your Lordships commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd of October last, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 23rd of August, on the subject of the complaint made by the Danish Minister of the hardships attending upon the application of the Order in Council of the 11th of August, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers,* a further note from the Danish Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, renewing the representations made by General Oxholm;† and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the reply to be returned to Count Reventlo.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 25th of October last, stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to transmit to me a further note which has been received from the Danish Chargé d'Affaires on the subject of the date at which the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic was known at Copenhagen; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That with reference to these remonstrances and observations of the Danish Government, I reported on the 22nd of November, with reference to a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, that no direct answer could then conveniently be given to the notes of the Danish Minister.‡

This state of things is, however, materially altered in favour of Her Majesty's Government, and adversely to the Danish Government, by the recent Judgment of the Admiralty Court in the case of the "Franciska" (fully reported in the "Times" newspaper of the 29th January last).

By this Judgment the notoriety of the blockade throughout Denmark by the middle of May is fully established, and the Court made some striking remarks upon some of the documents which were adduced in proof against the Crown, some of which came directly from, and others were authenticated by, the Danish Government and Legation, especially upon the "Merchants' Certificate," officially procured by the Danish Government and transmitted to its Legation, and authenticated by the Legation, of which document the Court said that "it required considerable self-command to speak with patience." It is also to be borne in mind that the Crown produced in evidence copies of Danish newspapers, published at Copenhagen on the 19th and 20th of May, 1854, containing a distinct announcement, received viâ Hamburgh, that the blockade was then effectually established. It was also proved that the blockade was notorious at Hamburgh by the end of April, and that intelligence was conveyed from Hamburgh to Copenhagen in sixty hours.

Under these circumstances, I respectfully submit to your Lordship that the Danish Government was not justified in making, through its Legation here, the various official and direct statements which it has done on this subject on several occasions to your Lordship; such, for instance, as this:—

Pretence that blockade was unknown.

"En déclarant ainsi par ordre de mon Gouvernement qu'avant la date du 3 Juin dernier les autorités compétentes en Danemark ignoraient le blocus."—(In Count Reventlow's note of September 28.)

It will be for your Lordship to determine what communications should be now addressed to the Danish Government on this subject.

I beg to recall to your Lordship's attention a passage in my Report of the 23rd of August,[*] in which I anticipated what has since occurred in this matter on the part of the Danish authorities, and stated that "I have already seen many cases in which the Danish authorities have lent themselves with great facility to protecting Russian commercial interests during the war; and I suspect that a pretended or wilful ignorance of the blockade will be in many cases set up, and perhaps supported by the Danish officials at various Baltic ports."

I venture to remind your Lordship of the numerous occasions on which I have in other Reports adverted to the fraudulent evasions of Her Majesty's belligerent rights so frequently practised in Denmark.

Should any further communications pass with Denmark on this subject, or should your Lordship consider that there exists no just ground of complaint against the Danish Government or authorities by reason of their conduct and statements with reference to the blockade in question, I request to be informed thereof, in order that I may be thereby guided in the consideration of other Danish official documents, and in the prize cases in which Danish interests may be involved, several of which cases are still pending, and others which may be reasonably expected to arise.

Doctors' Commons, February 17, 1855.

My Lord,

As to neutrality of Ionian vessels.

THE Ionian vessel "Lencade," bound, as alleged, from the Ionian Islands to Trebizond, was captured on May 14 by Her Majesty's ship "Firebrand," in the Black Sea, about forty miles from Kaffa, proceeding, as would appear by her course and by her papers, for Taganrog, or some port in the Sea of Azoff, with a cargo of olive oil. She seems to have applied at Constantinople for a clearance to Taganrog, which was refused. She is proceeded against in the Admiralty Court, and is claimed by her Ionian owners, Stematopulos Brothers of Santa Maura, by whom costs and damages are prayed, and it will probably be argued that she is an Ionian, is a neutral vessel, and therefore at liberty to trade with the enemy, and if so, unlawfully captured under the circumstances. The question is important in principle, and has been adverted to by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, and by the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, as would appear by a report of the Law Officers, May 19, 1854,[†] connected with the refusal of clearances to Ionian ships.

Wants information.

Under these circumstances I have the honour to request that I may be supplied with, or referred to, any information or authority coming from the Ionian Islands or elsewhere, tending to show that Ionian vessels cannot legally be considered as neutrals, or otherwise materially bearing on the subject.

The case comes on for hearing on February 22, and is not the only one of the class.

Doctors' Commons, February 17, 1855.

My Lord,

Evidence given in Danish Court by British Vice-Consul in blockade case, against British Crown.

I BEG to invite your Lordship's attention to the accompanying document, from which it will appear that Mr. Larlham, Her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Elsinore, was summoned in September, 1854, before a Danish Court, and there examined as a witness on behalf of a Danish claimant, and against the Crown in a prize cause then pending in the High Court of Admiralty here.

This examination was used and insisted upon on behalf of the claimants in the Admiralty Court, at the recent hearing of the "Steen Bille," and of the various cases of neutral ships captured for breaking the blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic.

I do not wish to be understood as making or implying any charge whatever against Mr. Larlham, who may have had no option in the matter, or may have acted in pursuance of his instructions; but the serious consequences which may result from Her Majesty's Consuls being examined before Danish Courts as witnesses on behalf of Danish claimants, and against the Crown in Prizes Causes, will probably occur to your Lordship, and Mr. Larlham may perhaps be asked to explain the Danish Law, and the facts connected with such examination.

ADMIRALTY PRIZE COURT.—THE "STEEN BILLE."

Examination of William Robert Larlham, British Vice-Consul at Elsinore, and other Papers in connection therewith, September 13, 1854.

(Translation.)

WILHELM CHRISTOPHER CRONE, Judge Sheriff and Police Master, and Knud von Hadeln, Counsellor of Justice, Registrar, Town Clerk, and Knight of the Dannebroge, in the sea and mercantile town of Elsinore, makes known—

That in the year 1854, on the 13th of September, 12 o'clock at noon, the Sea Court of Elsinore was set in the Sheriff's office in presence of the Court witnesses, Frode and Kündson.

The Court was administered by the ordinary Judge, and, in the absence of the Town Clerk (on notarial business), by the Juridical, examined Chief Möller, duly constituted by the Bailiff, when there appeared before the Court Mr. Andreas Peter Andersen, Ship Agent Chief for the clearing-house of Petersen and Andersen, of Elsinore; also part and managing owner of the schooner "Steen Bille" belonging to this place (Peder Hansen Beck, Master), which vessel on the 25th May this year was made a prize by the English steam sloop "Conflict," and produced a written Requisition of yesterday's date directed to the Judge, which ran thus:—

Being part and managing owner of the Danish schooner "Steen Bille" commanded by Captain Peder Hansen Beck, which vessel was captured in the Baltic by the English man-of-war steam sloop "Conflict" on the 25th May of this year, I am in need of a declaration from the British Vice-Consul here, Mr. W. R. Larlham, to be enabled to protect the said vessel before the Admiralty Prize Court of London; and, therefore, make free to request the honourable Judge to let the said Mr. W. R. Larlham, British Vice-Consul, be summoned before the Court to ask for his answer to the following questions:—

Whether Mr. Consul W. R. Larlham does acknowledge that Andreas Peter Andersen, Ship Agent of the firm of Petersen and Andersen, ship clearers here, part owner in the schooner "Steen Bille" belonging to Elsinore, in the kingdom of Denmark, on the 18th May in the present year 1854, did appear in the British Consulate, and made Mr. Larlham, the Vice-Consul the question "if the Russian ports in the Baltic were blockaded," and that he gave for answer to the said Mr. Andreas Peter Andersen that the British Consulate here had not received any official communication to that effect.

In case Mr. Consul Larlham should not accurately remember the date that this inquiry was made, I beg he may be asked if he has not taken down any remark or annotation of the question, or if he does not recollect anything having occurred which could lead to an explication as to what day Mr. Andersen appeared in the Consulate making the above inquiry.

The reply of Mr. Consul Larlham when signed and sworn to according to law I beg may be transmitted to me in due written form.

Elsinore, September 12, 1854.

Respectfully,
(Signed) Andr. P. Andersen, Ship Agent.

To Mr. W. Crone,
Judge and Sheriff, present.

Produced in the Sea Court of Elsinore, the 13th September, 1854.
(Signed) T. Moller, Clerk.

In reference to the foregoing the Deponent requested that the British Vice-Consul present, Mr. W. R. Larlham, who appeared in the Court, might have the questions made in the requisition put to him for being answered.

The British Vice-Consul in the town of Elsinore, Mr. William Robert Larlham, had been summoned to appear before the Court, and had attended. He was made acquainted with the contents of the requisition, particularly so with the questions therein set forth which he was called upon to reply to in such a manner as he considered himself enabled to testify on oath.

To the first question made in the requisition, Mr. Larlham, the Vice-Consul, gave the following reply:—

I can well recollect that Mr. Andreas Peter Andersen, Ship Agent, who is present in this Court, once in the month of May this year appeared in the British Consulate present, and inquired from me if the Russian ports in the Baltic were blockaded, and that I replied thereto to him that the Consulate had received no official communication thereof. I do not consider myself enabled to depose on oath any testimony on which day in the month of May this happened.

The second question made in the requisition was then put to the appearer, to which he replied:—

"That it was not customary in the Consulate to make any remark or annotation in reference to the like verbal questions, and that this formality had not been observed on the above occasion."

He, however, recollects that on the same day that Mr. Andersen had appeared in the Consulate, and made the question alluded to, he went down towards the harbour and there learned that the schooner "Steen Bille," herein-mentioned, had that very day been here in the roads, and, by the Sound list, it may be seen that the said vessel cleared the Sounds' duty on the 18th May this year, on her voyage to the Baltic. I do not entertain any doubt but that it has in reality been on the above-named 18th May that the conversation between Mr. Andersen and myself herein referred to has taken place.

The contents of the Protocol having been recited, Mr. Consul Larlham ratified his declaration thereto given, testifying thereupon the correctness thereof by his signature and corporal oath, as ordained by law.

(Signed) William Robert Larlham.

Mr. Andersen, Ship Agent, then requested that this Act might be closed, and asked for a copy thereof, made out in legal written form, which request was granted by the Court.

Court adjourned.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 20.)

Doctors' Commons, February 20, 1855.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, inclosing copies of his correspondence with Rear-Admiral Sir Edmund Lyons, respecting the blockade of Russian ports in the Black Sea; and to request that I would communicate to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on these papers.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Intelligence of intended blockade of Black Sea.

That, as I understand the facts, the joint notice of the intended blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, signed by Admirals Lyons and Bruat, and dated Port of Kamiesh, 15th January, 1855, has been officially communicated to the Ottoman Porte by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. I gather, however, from Count Walewski's note of the 12th February, transmitted to me with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th February, that this communication was of a confidential character, and was made on behalf of the French, as well as of the British Government. The course adopted in this matter appears to me to have been proper under the circumstances, and the communication thus made should not, in my opinion, be published without the consent of the Turkish Government. I see no legal necessity for its publication, and the Turkish Government, in conjunction with the British and French Ambassadors, may perhaps be requested to publish it, or not, as may be considered most advisable at Constantinople. I do not, however, clearly understand when or where, or in what shape the notice of the Admirals has (if at all) been published at Constantinople or elsewhere, and the propriety of publishing it here in any shape must be considered with reference to the circumstances of its previous publication. The notice, although confidentially communicated to the Turkish Government, has, nevertheless, as I apprehend, been published somehow and somewhere by the Admirals, and has (if I mistake not) already appeared in the "Moniteur." Of all this, however, I have no official knowledge, and I may possibly have misapprehended the facts. If I am to assume that the necessary information of the actual establishment of the blockade may be now hourly expected, I do not anticipate any very great practical advantage from now publishing the notice in question, from which it should be borne in mind that the exigencies of war or weather, and the great extent of the intended blockade, may compel the Admirals to deviate in some particulars in the actual execution of the intended blockade. Neither the notice nor any other which has hitherto appeared will be held by British Prize Courts to amount to a legal notification, or to dispense with the necessity for such notification being published as soon as possible; the delay will not vitiate the blockade, but will render it less efficacious.

Must be notified when de facto established.

The publication of the notice here will, I apprehend, be considered to amount to an admission that, up to the date of such publication, no intelligence of the actual establishment of the blockade had reached Her Majesty's Government, which is to be regretted; and if circumstances should delay or interfere with the actual establishment of the very extensive blockade contemplated, the publication of the notice may be attended with inconvenience and embarrassment hereafter.

My Lord,

Intended blockade of Kertch and Odessa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me, for my information, and for any observations which I may have to offer to your Lordship thereupon, the accompanying letter dated February 12, from the Admiralty, inclosing an extract of a report from Sir Edmund Lyons, respecting the blockade of Kertch and Odessa.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No remarks.

That it does not occur to me that I can usefully offer any observations upon Sir E. Lyons' letter, which sets forth the nature, amount, and disposition of the naval force, which he means to employ in carrying out the intended blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, I presume that he is satisfied that such force is sufficient for the purpose.

My Lord,

Blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying note from Count Walewski on the subject of the form in which the English and French Embassies at Constantinople communicated to the Turkish Government the declarations of the allied Admirals of the 15th January last with regard to the blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations I may have to offer upon the French Ambassador's note.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the observations contained in my report of the 20th February,* with reference to the correspondence between Sir E. Lyons and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, will be found in some respects applicable to Count Walewski's note of the 12th February.

The giving publicity to the communication addressed to the Turkish Government will not in England have any legal effect, the propriety of publishing it is rather a diplomatic and political than a legal question. The publication might certainly have a somewhat favourable result by increasing the notoriety of the allies' intention to institute this blockade, but looking to the dates, and bearing in mind that the blockade has by this time either failed or fallen short of the notice, or has already been in operation three weeks, and that intelligence of its existence may be hourly expected, upon which a regular and legal notification may be issued, I see no necessity for taking any further steps at present.

No use notifying prospective blockade when notice of its de facto establishment is hourly expected.

Blockade of Odessa.

Better wait for information of its establishment before publishing.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 19th February instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 12th,* he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Board of Admiralty, from which I shall perceive that the Board have not received a copy of the declaration of intended blockade as sent ashore at Odessa, but they consider that it must be identical with the notification forwarded by Sir E. Lyons in his letter of the 16th January, of which a copy is inclosed in the annexed letter from the Board of Admiralty.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That under the circumstances stated, it will be for the Admiralty to decide whether, in the absence of a copy of the document in question, they consider that any publication as suggested in my report of the 12th can safely be made.

Possibly, inasmuch as positive information of the existence of the blockade may be hourly expected (upon which a legal notification may be founded), it may be thought more prudent to delay the publication in question until a copy of the document sent on shore by the flag of truce is forthcoming.

My Lord,

Contraband of war. Trade between Russia and Hans Towns.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying note from Count Walewski, the French Ambassador at this Court, communicating to your Lordship certain information which has reached the French Government, respecting the trade carried on by the Hanseatic towns in articles contraband of war destined for Russia, and suggesting that, as soon as the state of the weather in the Baltic in the ensuing season will permit, the French and English Governments should station cruizers to watch those towns, with the view to prevent the entry of goods contraband of war; and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion upon the measures suggested by the French Ambassador.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot capture when entering Hanseatic ports.

That we are of opinion that the allied cruizers will not be justified in detaining or capturing Hanseatic vessels entering their own ports, even if they have on board articles, which, if afterwards carried to the enemy, would become contraband of war.

Contraband depends on destination.

It is not the nature of the article alone, but its destination which constitutes it contraband of war.

My Lord, 50, Connaught Square, February 28, 1855, 7·30 P.M.

Arms at Harburg suspected for Russia.

I AM favoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of this day's date, transmitting to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Hanover, relative to the arrival of twenty cases of revolver pistols at Harburg, and reporting the steps taken by him with a view of preventing their being forwarded to the enemy, and Lord Wodehouse requests that I will state to your Lordship my opinion whether, in the event of Mr. Bligh's prevailing upon the Hanoverian Government to stop these arms, Her Majesty's Government would be justified in instructing Mr. Bligh to demand their continued detention.

I have accordingly considered Mr. Bligh's despatch and its inclosure, and have the honour to Report—

Cannot demand continued detention.

That inasmuch as the messenger is directed to wait for an answer, I have no opportunity of referring to books, or forming any very satisfactory opinion on the point; but (as at present advised) I am of opinion that if the suggested demand for the continued detention of these pistols were refused by the Hanoverian Government, such refusal would not amount to a breach of international law or usage. I observe that the pistols are merely passing through Hanover from Hamburgh to Tilsit, and no Hanoverian law is suggested or alluded to as bearing on the subject; their continued detention by the Hanoverian Government would amount to confiscation or sequestration, and, notwithstanding the great probability that they are destined for the enemy's use, there does not appear to me to exist any legal proof of this.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 1, 1855.

Blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th February, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 20th,* he was directed to transmit to me a further despatch from Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, inclosed a despatch from Sir E. Lyons, stating, with reference to his previons notice, inclosed in Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's despatch No. 79 of February 1, also transmitted, that the Russian ports of the Black Sea, as before enumerated by him, are actually in a state of effective blockade, and have been so from the date of the first of the present month.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether the publication of Sir E. Lyons' despatch in the "Gazette" may now take place.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to add that your Lordship would also be glad to receive from me a form of publication for insertion in the "Gazette," if I should consider such publication advisable.

Lord Wodehouse further states that your Lordship proposes to approve the course which Lord Stratford intends to pursue, but that your Lordship requests my opinion whether any further instructions to his Excellency are required.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Notification for "Gazette."

Irregular announcement by Admiral.

That assuming Sir E. Lyons' letter to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe is satisfactory to your Lordship as a formal and official statement of the actual establishment of the blockade of the ports mentioned, and a sufficient authority for the issuing of a formal notification of such blockade, I am of opinion that the usual notification and publication in the "Gazette" may now take place, and I have accordingly prepared and herewith transmit a form of notification for insertion in the "Gazette." I observe that no direct and official information from Sir E. Lyons has as yet been addressed to the Admiralty on this subject, and I also beg leave to point out that the course indicated in my confidential Memorandum on blockade (printed by the Admiralty) has not been strictly followed in this case. The actual commencement of the blockade having been announced, not as a separate and distinct fact, but only with reference to a previous notice, which notice has not been officially published in England, and as to the publication of which elsewhere I am in some doubt. Although there may have been sufficient reasons for this, yet it is impossible to foresee or to guard against the various legal difficulties and inconveniences which may ultimately arise from any material deviations from the course I have distinctly pointed out in that Memorandum.

I presume that Lord Stratford will take care that Her Majesty's Consuls throughout Turkey and the Levant receive distinct official notice that the blockade is established, and was in actual operation on and from February 1, and I do not therefore see any necessity for sending any special instructions to his Lordship. No notification having been issued that the blockade of the Danube has been raised, that blockade must, I presume, be considered as still existing.

I beg to refer to my report of February 12,* upon some communications from Admiral Lyons, and Captains Broke and Giffard, and to suggest that, nothwithstanding the present notification, it will be, in my opinion, advisable to publish in the "Gazette" Captain Broke's despatch, accompanied by some official statement of the notice therein alluded to, having been in fact conveyed under flags of truce to the other Russian ports now blockaded, at the respective dates when this actually took place at each port.

I do not consider it necessary to alter the draft notification which accompanied that report.

Notices given under flag of truce may be published in "Gazette."

The papers now inclosed would, of course, if they had been previously submitted to me, have modified certain portions of that Report, and it now appears to me to be advisable to publish, either in the same or in the next subsequent "Gazette" to that in which the notification may be published, Captain Broke's previous despatch relating to the communication of this notification to the port of Odessa by flag of truce. A note should be added to Captain Broke's despatch to explain that such notification was to the effect that the ports (the actual blockade of which is now published in the "Gazette") would be blockaded as from the 1st of February; any further distinct official information of the notification having been communicated to blockaded ports by flag of truce previous to the 1st of February, may also be published with the concurrence of the Admiralty and of the French Government.

Such publication will show that neutrals in the blockaded ports received ample and authentic notice of the intended blockade, and this may be of use hereafter either in the Prize Courts or in answer to any complaints from neutral Governments.

My Lord,

Dutch cargo of rye at Eupatoria.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th of February last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith a note from the Dutch Minister at this Court, requesting to be informed whether there would be any objection to Messrs. Kaars Sypertyn, Dutch merchants, sending a ship from Constantinople to export from Eupatoria a cargo of rye which had been purchased previously to the breaking out of the war, and whether, should the rye in question have been appropriated for the use of the allied army in the Crimea, the owners would be indemnified for their loss by the allied Governments; and to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's note into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Netherlands vessel may trade with Eupatoria.

That if the French Government concur, Baron Bentinck may be informed that any Netherland merchant vessel is at present at perfect liberty to enter and trade at, and quit the port of Eupatoria.

As to compensation if rye has been used by allied armies, &c.

I have no means of knowing whether the export of cereals from that port is or is not permitted under present circumstances. Baron Bentinck appears to assume that if such exportation should be forbidden, or should the rye in question have been disposed of by the allied generals, that the Netherland merchants will be indemnified by the allied Governments. I must observe that it appears to me premature to admit this assumption, or to discuss the question hypothetically, and without full information and proof of the facts connected with the transaction.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 13th February last, stating that with reference to my letter of the 8th January last,* and to previous correspondence respecting the claim to compensation advanced by the Netherland Government on behalf of the owners of the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," in consequence of the alleged unjust detention of those vessels by the cruisers of Her Majesty's squadron in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me a note which your Lordship has addressed to the Netherland Minister at this Court in conformity with the suggestions contained in my above-mentioned letter, together with a note which has been received from Baron Bentinck in reply thereto, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, together with the former documents, and report to your Lordship my opinion on the course which I consider it advisable for Her Majesty's Government to pursue in regard to this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

Discrepancies in statements as to contraband of war.

That the papers referred to and inclosed in Baron Bentinck's note being in Dutch I am not aware I have seen them before, or whether they contain anything material which I have not seen. If the facts are strictly as stated in the passages marked in pencil in his Excellency's note, I confess that I am somewhat at a loss to understand Admiral Dundas' statements in his letter to the Admiralty, No. 626 of the 26th November, 1854, "that the cargoes were partly contraband of war," and that "the masters were fully aware of the illegal nature of their proceedings, and that a blockade would probably be soon established." Possibly, as the Admiral is now in England, some further and more satisfactory explanation or information may be obtained from him.

The question, as I have observed, is mainly "were these masters acting in honest ignorance, and in perfect good faith?" The Admiral is convinced that they were not. The allegations of Baron Bentinck tend strongly to show that they were.

Advises compensation.

Subject to these observations, I retain my impression in favour of the right of the owners of these vessels to receive some compensation from Her Majesty's Government. The amount has not yet been suggested by the Netherland Government, but this may perhaps be conveniently referred to arbitration.

Blockades in Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of this day's date stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying form of notification proposed to be inserted in the "Gazette," and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and return it to your Lordship with any alterations which I may deem necessary.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I presume that the words "notifications" in the body of Captain Broke's despatch must be a mistake.

Notification must be precise.

I have further to observe that unless a copy of the document delivered at Odessa is forthcoming, or can be referred to, I fear that the publication of this notification must be postponed. "Similar to" will not be a sufficient legal description, and if the document delivered at Odessa was verbally identical with any document now in the possession of Her Majesty's Government, the contents can, and should be given verbatim. I have accordingly so altered the draft notification herewith returned.

I presume that the Admiralty must have a copy of the document which was delivered at Odessa. If not, I fear the publication must be postponed.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of yesterday's date, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople respecting the raising of the blockade of the mouths of the Danube on the 18th of February last by the Commanders-in-chief of the English and French naval forces in the Black Sea; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and draw up and transmit to your Lordship a notification of the raising of the said blockade for insertion in this day's "Gazette," unless I see any legal objections thereto.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's note of the same date transmitting two letters from the Admiralty inclosing copies of the notifications of the raising of the blockade of the Danube, and of the establishment of the blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, by the French and English Admirals.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

It is hereby notified that cruizers of the allied fleets are and will remain stationed off the mouths of the Danube to capture any vessels laden with contraband of war destined for the use of the enemy.

Blockade of Black Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 8th March instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 7th,* respecting the publication in the "Gazette" of Captain Broke's letter of the 19th January last, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty on the subject of the notification of blockade delivered by Captain Broke to the Russian Captain of Quarantine, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, whether there is anything in the inclosed letter to induce me to change my opinion with regard to the postponement of the publication in the "Gazette" of Captain Broke's abovementioned letter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That there is nothing in the inclosed letter from the Admiralty to induce me to change my opinion with regard to the postponement of the publication in the "Gazette" of Captain Broke's letter.

As to notification.

I observe that the Admiralty state that "their Lordships see no reason to doubt that the two documents were in substance similar to the notification published in the supplement to the "London Gazette" of the 2nd instant."

Nevertheless the publication of Captain Broke's letter referring to these notifications, without annexing thereto any copy of the notifications actually delivered by him, or any clear and distinct statement of their actual contents, would not, in my opinion, be advisable.

Distinct information may be published,

I much regret the existence of this difficulty, and can only suggest that if the Admiralty should feel authorized to publish any distinct official information to the effect (say) "that a formal written notice in French and English, signed by   , and addressed to   , stating that the blockade of the port in each case would commence on and from the 1st of February, was sent on shore under a flag of truce by the allied cruizers, and delivered to a Russian officer at Odessa on the   , at Kertch on the   ," and so forth, such a publication will, in my opinion, be advisable.

If the Admiralty know precisely what did in fact take place, such information may be published, even without publishing the despatch verbatim in each case or giving a literal copy of the notification.

but not conjectures.

If they do not positively know this, no conjectures (however probable) will be sufficient to authorize the publication, and such conjectures cannot be legally relied upon, and often turn out very unexpectedly to be unsupported by the facts.

Black Sea blockade. Consul Smith's notification of, at Lisbon.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th February last, stating that he was directed to transmit a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon, respecting the proceedings of Her Majesty's Consul at that port with regard to the blockade by the allied forces of the Russian ports in the Black Sea; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That Sir R. Packenham's advice to Mr. Consul Smith was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, judicious and proper.

Intended blockade is not de facto.

The official announcement of an intended blockade is not equivalent to a notification of a blockade; but, as a general principle, Consuls cannot do wrong if they give publicity to authentic official documents on the subject emanating from the Government of any of the allied Powers. In this particular case the intended blockade has

My Lord,

British machine manufacturers at Warsaw.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd of March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Prussian Minister at this Court, representing the case of Messrs. Evans, British subjects, who are established as machine manufacturers at Warsaw, and who desire to be informed whether, under the provisions of the Queen's Proclamation of the 8th ultimo, they may continue their works in the Russian dominions and execute orders for the Russian Government, so long as they do not manufacture machinery usable for military purposes, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion on this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May execute orders for Russian Government if of an agricultural and commercial nature.

That I observe that Messrs. Evans do not appear to have themselves directly applied to your Lordship, or to any British authority on this subject. Possibly this omission may be capable of explanation from the circumstances of their being established in the enemy's country. Subject to this observation, I am of opinion that provided they confine themselves strictly to manufacturing machines used in agriculture and commerce exclusively, they may execute orders for the Russian Government without contravening the provisions of Her Majesty's Proclamation of the 8th of February.

My Lord,

Remonstrance of Netherlands Minister against Prize Court decision.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 14th of March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court respecting the decision of the Admiralty Prize Court in the case of the Dutch vessel "Anechina Jantina," and to request that I would take the same into my consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Baron Bentinck.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I would most respectfully venture to point out to your Lordship the inconvenience and unreasonableness of your being drawn into a discussion as to the legal grounds of a judgment of the Court of Admiralty not pronounced upon any new or peculiar point, or upon a case primâ impressionis, nor until after the claimants had been permitted to bring forward the fullest "further proof" of their innocence. His Excellency can hardly be ignorant of the real grounds of the judgment, and cannot expect your Lordship to discuss questions of law or fact already decided by the English Courts in favour of the Crown.

Messrs. Bourke's counsel can at all events give Baron Bentinck a full and particular account of the grounds upon which that judgment was pronounced.

Not expedient to discuss such matters with a Foreign Minister.

I would further observe that although there may be no intention of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in this particular case, yet that other cases of a similar class are actually appealed, and that it is, in my opinion, highly inexpedient for your Lordship to embark in a discussion with a Foreign Minister upon the law or the facts of this particular case whilst these appeals are pending.

1853-56

In this very case further proceedings as to the freight took place in Court on the 16th of March, after I had received Lord Wodehouse's letter, and whilst I was preparing this report.

I would most respectfully submit that if your Lordship is to undertake to explain and justify the decision of the Court in this particular case, it will be difficult for your Lordship hereafter to decline or avoid pursuing a similar course in many other cases, which will be highly inconvenient.

I would further point out that Baron Bentinck ingeniously mixes up complaints of the injustice of the sentence of the Court (both as to the ship and the cargo, and the costs), with an appeal to the compassion of Her Majesty's Government as to the costs. His Excellency does not appear simply to ask as a favour for the remission of the costs, or rather for their payment by the public.

Costs cannot be remitted.

I would therefore venture to suggest that an answer may be returned to Baron Bentinck to the effect "that the cargo having been decreed by the Court to be restored only conditionally upon the payment of the costs and expenses of the captors, your Lordship has no power to alter this Decree, and sees no sufficient reason why the costs (which must in any event be paid) should be paid by the Crown instead of Messrs. Bourke and Co., the successful opponents of the Crown in this particular matter.

"That your Lordship must decline for obvious reasons to enter into any discussion of the facts of the case, whether relating to the ship or the cargo or the legal points involved therein, contenting yourself with observing that the case presented no novel or extraordinary features, and involved no new legal principle; that the claimants both of the ship and cargo had the fullest hearing, were permitted to bring all the 'further proof' they could adduce, and were apprized of the grounds of the decision, and did appeal from the sentence of the Court, a sentence which (as relates to the cargo) was founded exclusively upon the claimant's own evidence, none having been adduced against them by the Crown."

It might not, perhaps, be altogether unadvisable to subjoin some intimation that the unsuccessful result of the application recently made by Her Majesty's Government to the Netherlands Government on behalf of Captain Dreland was not such as to dispose Her Majesty's Government to any very favourable view of applications for payment out of the Public Revenue of the costs of Dutch litigants in British Courts; Captain Dreland (though successful) having been ruined by the costs of six years litigation in Dutch Courts with an officer of the Netherlands Government, without obtaining any redress whatsoever.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to add, for your Lordship's further satisfaction, that Riga having been blockaded from the 17th April, this vessel broke that blockade by entering the port on the 16th May in ballast, and also by sailing therefrom on the 21st with a cargo; she was captured on this latter voyage on the 23rd May, and therefore most reasonably condemned for breach of blockade.

Cargo was restored, owners being possibly unable to countermand shipment.

With reference to the cargo, the Court took a very lenient view, and thought that although the shippers at Riga were fully aware of the blockade, yet that it might have been put on board without the Dutch owners having any sufficient opportunity of countermanding it, the ship having been chartered by them in Holland before the blockade was known there, although after the war was known, and a blockade must have been expected.

The Court therefore restored the cargo; but the ship being clearly in delicto, and the cargo having been actually shipped in violation of blockade, the Court made the restoration of that cargo, subject to the payment of the captor's costs, agreeably to the invariable practice in cases where there exists justifiable cause of capture. I consider that the owners of the cargo may think themselves well off under the circumstances which would, in my opinion, have legally justified the condemnation of the cargo, or, at all events, an appeal on the part of the Crown, which has not been attempted.

I can therefore see no reason why Her Majesty's Government should pay the costs which the Court has (in my opinion justly) ordered Messrs. Bourke to pay before they receive back their property. They well knew that a blockade of Riga might reasonably be expected when they chartered this ship; they used no diligence in "countermanding" when they first heard of the blockade; the ship actually broke the blockade whilst in their service; the cargo was shipped from a blockaded port by their agents, and on their account, in open defiance of the blockade, and they have, in my opinion, no claim whatsoever for favourable consideration on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The maxim "Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus" is fairly applicable to them.

I inclose a report of the Judgment which, though short, is substantially correct.

I have, &c.

THE "ANNECHINA JANTINA."

Judgment delivered by Dr. Lushington.

Judgment.

THIS was a Dutch vessel taken on the 23rd of May on a voyage from Amsterdam to Riga, and to return to Rotterdam with rye. She left on the 20th of April, reached Riga on the 16th of May, took on board a cargo, and left the 21st of May. The ship and freight, according to the principles I have laid down, must be condemned by reason of a breach of blockade by egress. As to the cargo—perhaps I am going to the fullest extent I am authorised in doing—as to the cargo I think I am justified in restoring that cargo on the payment of the captor's expenses.

The case is not precisely the same as those decided by Lord Stowell, but I think the principle on which he acted enables me to take the same course. Therefore I restore the cargo on payment of expenses.

My Lord,

Days of grace allowed on re-establishment of a blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th of March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Danish Minister at this Court, inquiring whether any and what time will be allowed to neutral vessels to leave Russian ports after the re-establishment of the blockade in the Baltic; and to request that I would report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion upon the answer to be returned to General Oxholm.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st March, stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to forward me a letter of inquiry upon the same subject from the Hans Towns Agent, together with a note from the French Ambassador, explaining the views of the French Government on this matter; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon. Lord Wodehouse is pleased to add that it is important that your Lordship should be furnished with my report with the least possible delay.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the answer to be returned to Baron Oxholm does not depend on any legal point, but is a matter of policy for the determination of Her Majesty's Government.

Question of policy.

The allowing egress to neutrals with cargoes for a definite period after blockade is a question, not of law but of policy. This was done at Archangel last year under particular circumstances, but was not, I believe, done in any other case.

I observe, however, that his Excellency omits to state whether the Danish vessels in question propose to leave blockaded Russian ports laden or only in ballast, which is a most important omission.

No necessity for the indulgence.

Subject to this observation, I concur in the opinion expressed by Count Walewski on this subject, and I see no necessity for fixing any such term or granting any similar indulgence to neutrals in Russian ports this year, unless the interests of the Allies, or those of their subjects who may be trading with the enemy, should be thereby materially promoted. Count Walewski's note appears to me to contain a sound exposition of what is the law and what may properly be adopted as the practice in the case of the impending blockade, and the application from Mr. Colquhoun may, in my opinion, properly be answered in accordance therewith.

As to vessels which shipped their cargoes before blockade.

It may be desirable that timely arrangements should be made and instructions issued by the Admiralty for identifying and securing the unmolested passage of these particular vessels (alluded to by Mr. Colquhoun), which can be clearly shown to have shipped their cargoes before the blockade, and for preventing fraud or error as to them, otherwise they may be either exposed to capture, or Her Majesty's naval officers will be placed in a difficult situation with respect to them.

Rye at Eupatoria belonging to Dutch merchant.

As to indemnification if appropriated by allied armies.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th March instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 5th* on a note addressed to your Lordship by the Dutch Minister, requesting to be informed whether there would be any objection on the part of Her Majesty's Government to the exportation by Messrs. Kaars Sypertryn and Co. from Eupatoria of a quantity of rye stated to have been purchased by the above-mentioned merchants in the months of October and November, 1853, and also whether, should the rye in question have been appropriated for the use of the allied forces in the Crimea, the owners would be indemnified for their loss by the Allied Governments, he was directed to transmit to me a note from Count Walewski, the French Ambassador at this Court, representing that a similar application has been addressed to the French Government by the Dutch Minister at Paris, and stating the views of his Government with regard to the application of Messrs. Kaars Sypertrin and Co. Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take the French Ambassador's note into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion upon the views of the French Government as therein set forth.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it is difficult to express any decided or satisfactory opinion as to the considerations applicable to cereal productions asserted to be neutral property which may have been taken and made use of at Eupatoria by the allied forces, without full information as to the facts of each particular case.

Allies not justified in capturing all property in enemy's ports.

It would be desirable, for instance, to know whether any claim or protest was made at the time by the agent of the asserted owners, whether the property was taken afloat or ashore, and whether in a public or private depository, or in whose actual possession or custody, and how marked or identified. I adhere to the opinion expressed in my report of March 5, that it is not advisable to discuss this matter beforehand, or on abstract principles, with the Netherlands Government. It seems to me to be desirable to induce neutral Governments to bring forward clear proof of the alleged facts in each case before deciding on it. I do not consider that the Allies would be justified in considering all cereals captured in the enemy's ports in the Black Sea as enemy's property merely because the Russian Government had previously forbidden the export of cereals, and had promised to indemnify the owners. If the Russian Government had previously taken possession, this would materially affect the case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot prevent trade between neutrals without proof that arms are intended for belligerents.

That inasmuch as there is nothing contrary to international law, where two Powers are at war, in the consignment of arms by the subjects of a neutral State to those of another neutral State, unless it could clearly be shown that such consignment was colourable, and that the arms were intended to be forwarded to one of the belligerents, to be used against the other (proof of which we apprehend would not in the present case be forthcoming), we are of opinion that no instructions can be given to Her Majesty's cruizers to prevent the introduction into a neutral territory of articles which if consigned to an enemy would be contraband of war.

Having thus answered the question put to us, we think it right to add that, in 1853-56

May remonstrate with neutral States and require them to enforce their laws, or in the absence of laws, to legislate for that purpose.

our opinion, if Her Majesty's Government has reason to know (though the means of legal proof may be wanting) that these consignments of arms are colourable, and that the arms are in fact destined for the Russian Government, and are ultimately forwarded to it by the subjects of the neutral State, Her Majesty's Government will have a right to call upon the Government of the neutral State to restrain its subjects from thus aiding our enemy by transmitting arms for its use. There can be no doubt that, according to the law of nations, it would be contrary to neutrality for a neutral State to assist either of the belligerents with arms or implements of war; and we think it follows as a legitimate and necessary consequence that that which would be a breach of international law in the nation collectively ought to be forbidden to its individual members; and consequently that this country has a right to insist on the Government of a neutral State, whose subjects are assisting our enemy with arms, to enforce the municipal law of such State, if any exists, to prevent such infraction of neutrality or if no such law exists, then to legislate for that purpose.

As to responsibility of State for acts of its subjects.

At the same time, although the right of a belligerent to call upon a neutral State to restrain its subjects from violating the obligations of neutrality appears to us to flow directly from the principle of the law of nations above referred to, we think we ought to point out that this responsibility of a neutral State for the acts of its individual subjects in furnishing arms or munitions of war to belligerent States has not hitherto, so far as we are aware, been made the subject of complaint or quarrel. And though our own Statute law prohibits the enlisting into foreign service, and the furnishing or equipping of vessels for foreign Powers, it does not prohibit the furnishing of arms, and there can be little doubt that arms have been largely supplied to foreign Governments by our own manufacturers; and it may be deserving of consideration whether it is desirable to assert a principle which on future occasions may be turned against ourselves to the detriment of our own manufacturers.

Our purpose in these remarks has simply been to point out, that if the evil of the transmission of arms to Russia should become of serious moment, and require vigorous means of repression, Her Majesty's Government may, according to the strict application of the priniciples of international law, peremptorily call on the Government of the Hans Towns or any other Government similarly circumstanced, to take measures to prevent its subjects from aiding our enemy.

Russian vessel "Sigrid" at Elsinore made over to British subject in payment of debt.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 28, 1855.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a Memorial from Mr. Walker of Hull, praying for permission to bring away from Elsinore a vessel called the "Sigrid," laden with salt, which has been made over to him in payment of a debt by a merchant at Helsingfors; and to request that I would take this Memorial into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which should be taken with regard to its prayer.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the Memorial into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May come to England for registration if bonâ fide.

That, having regard to Her Majesty's Order in Council of the 15th April, 1854, I am of opinion that this particular act of proposed trading with the enemy is not illegal, and provided your Lordship is satisfied of the truth and good faith of Mr. Walker, and that there is no secret arrangement or understanding by which the ship "Sigrid" will be hereafter restored to her Russian owner, instructions may be issued to the Admiralty and the Customs to permit the "Sigrid" to come to a British port for registration. Some previous communication should be made to the French Government on the subject.

The "Sigrid" is stated to be now lying at Elsinore laden with salt, but it is not stated from what port or at what date or under what circumstances she arrived there; and it would, in my opinion, be desirable to obtain this information from Her Majesty's Consul at that port.

Black Sea blockade.

Notice published at Malta.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 29, 1855.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 24th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Colonial Department, inclosing a notice issued by the Governor of Malta on the subject of the Black Sea blockade, and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on this notice.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the notice into consideration, and have the honour to report—

"London Gazette" notice must also be published there.

Urges prompt notice of blockades.

That it will be proper, notwithstanding this publication, to republish formally and officially at Malta the notification of the blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, inserted in the "London Gazette" of March 3rd. I would venture to observe that if it be considered by Her Majesty's Government desirable that the Admiral commanding Her Majesty's naval forces in the Black Sea should correspond officially and directly with the Governor of Malta, or with the governor of any other British possession, on the subject of blockade, and should in such cases officially notify the establishment and raising thereof to such governors (as to which it is not within my province to express any opinion), it will be, at all events, desirable that such information should be transmitted as promptly as possible; and I observe that in this instance, the blockade having been established on the 1st February, not suddenly, but by previous arrangement, the Admiral's letter to the Governor of Malta announcing it is dated the 20th February, and that the existence of this blockade, on and from the 1st February, appears to have been first made known at Malta on the 2nd March. Any delay in publishing official notices on the subject of blockade is always inconvenient and often of serious consequence, as has been lately exemplified in the argument in the High Court of Admiralty, in relation to the Baltic blockades of last year, and it may therefore appear to your Lordship desirable that the attention of naval officers generally should be drawn to this point.

Black Sea blockade.

Announcement in Ionian Islands.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 29, 1855.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 24th March instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 19th,[*] he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Colonial Department, inclosing a copy of the official announcement of the Black Sea blockade as promulgated by the Ionian Senate, and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

As to date when it was generally known.

That the notification of the actual establishment of the blockade of the Russian ports in the Black Sea, published in the "London Gazette" of the 3rd March, should be generally and officially promulgated in the Ionian Islands, notwithstanding the preliminary notice of the intention to institute such blockade, which has been published in the "Ionian Gazette," now with the papers; and that it will be desirable for the British authorities in those Islands to remark, and be prepared to prove, at what date the actual establishment and existence of the blockade was generally known in the Islands; whether by official notice or without this, as a matter of commercial or general intelligence.

My Lord,

Dutch vessels detained off Sulina by British cruizers.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th March instant, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 6th,* and to previous correspondence respecting the claim to compensation advanced by the Netherlands Government on behalf of the owners of the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," in consequence of the alleged unjust detention of those vessels by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me translations of the documents inclosed in Baron Bentinck's note of the 8th ultimo, together with a letter from the Admiralty in reply to a communication which was made to the department in conformity with the suggestion made in my above-mentioned letter, that Admiral Dundas might be called upon to furnish some further and more satisfactory explanation upon this subject; and Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take these further papers, together with the former documents (inclosed), into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion as to the course which I now consider it advisable for Her Majesty's Government to pursue in regard to this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot refuse compensation.

That inasmuch as it now appears that Admiral Dundas is unable to give any further information on the subject of the existence of any reasonable cause justifying the detention of these two vessels, I do not see how the demand of the Netherlands Minister for some compensation to their owners can be fairly refused. If this be so, the only points remaining to be settled will be the amount or scale of such compensation, and the manner in which this can be best determined and the matter can be most amicably, effectually, and finally settled.

Information necessary for assessing damages.

It will be desirable to ascertain precisely the contents and destination of the cargoes, as also how they were ultimately disposed of, as also the nature and terms of the voyage on which each vessel was engaged when detained, and the knowledge of the masters or shippers (if they had any such knowledge) that a blockade of the Danube was to be anticipated, or was imminent at the time they left Constantinople.

These points will have a bearing more or less important according to circumstances on the amount of compensation.

It should also be distinctly stated on whose individual behalf and on what particular account each item of such compensation is demanded.

It will be for your Lordship's consideration whether the Netherlands Government should be requested to commence by stating the amount and particulars of the compensation demanded (as was done by the French Government in the case of Captain Belard of the ship "Prophète" at the Mauritius), or whether the whole question should be referred to arbitration (as in Croft's case with the Portuguese Government). From the peculiar circumstances of this case and the amount of consequential and contingent damage likely to be demanded, a resort to arbitration may ultimately be found advisable, especially should a large amount of compensation be claimed.

As to arbitration.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 24th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Oporto,* together with a printed notice in which he has given publicity to the Queen's Proclamation of the 25th February, warning British subjects against adhering to, or assisting the Queen's enemies; and to request that I would take the Consul's notice into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to whether British subjects sending port wine from Oporto to Memel for account of Russian subjects residing in Russia, render themselves thereby liable to the penalties referred to in that notice.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

British subjects in Portugal may supply him with port wine notwithstanding.

That British subjects having a commercial domicile in Portugal, and sending port wine from thence to Memel for account of Russian subjects residing in Russia, do not render themselves liable to the penalties referred to in the notice.

I perhaps may be excused for suggesting that it does not seem to me to be necessary or expedient for British Consuls to publish, without instructions, and of their own authority, official notices relating to the Statute 25 Ed. 3, c. 2, or to the English law relating to high treason. If the giving any such notices should be advisable, the notices should be carefully drawn under competent legal advice.

My Lord,

Circular to French Consuls in Principalities.

Partial raising of Danube blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Consul Gardner and a letter from the Admiralty respecting a circular note to the French Consuls in the Principalities, announcing the raising of the blockade of the Danube; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I propose to confine my observations to the French Circular note to the French Consuls, without alluding to any of the other matters contained in Consul Gardner's letter.

This "Circular note" speaks of orders having been given by the allied Governments to the Admirals authorizing them to except from the blockade of the Danube vessels in ballast destined for ports in the Principalities, and vessels leaving those ports with cargo. It does not state from what date such exceptions were to come into operation, and it rather infers, or states by implication, but not positively or distinctly, that in all other respects, and especially as to vessels entering with cargo even for ports in the Principalities, the blockade would be maintained. This appears to me to be at variance with the real intention of the allies, which has been by mutual understanding carried into effect, viz., the entire and unqualified raising of the blockade on and from the 18th of February.

I observe that there is no date to the Circular, nor does it appear by whom it was issued. It seems to have arrived at Jassy on or shortly before the 23rd of February, and was probably issued and received in ignorance of the blockade having been raised on the 18th of February.

I presume that the raising of the blockade on the 18th of February was not known at Jassy on the 23rd of February, but I do not know how this may really have been. The issuing of this Circular seems to me unfortunate under the circumstances, and it is likely to cause doubt and confusion unless indeed it should have been subsequently superseded, and in effect annulled, by the receipt of information of the actual raising of the blockade on and from the 18th of February without qualification or exception.

I am the more at loss to understand the object of this Circular from having understood that the French Government was anxious for the entire and unqualified raising of the blockade of the Danube, and recommended the adoption of this measure to Her Majesty's Government, and I am not aware of any orders having been sent to the Naval Officers of the allies to raise it partially, or in the qualified manner adverted to in the Circular. Such orders would have been, in my opinion, injudicious and calculated to render the subsequent validity of any such qualified blockade very questionable. It will be for your Lordship to consider whether any and what measures can be adopted to counteract the effect of this Circular note.

Baltic blockade.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 5th March instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 16th February,* relative to proceedings in the Admiralty Court in cases of vessels captured under Danish colours by Her Majesty's cruizers, he was directed to transmit to me a note which your Lordship addressed to the Danish Minister at this Court on that subject, and a note received in reply from General Oxholm; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that I would furnish your Lordship with the detailed information which General Oxholm requests in regard to the allegations made against Danish authorities in the cases in question, and which your Lordship thinks he is justified in demanding.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to state—

Refutation of Danish Minister's arguments as to its being unknown, &c.

That I have procured from the Queen's Proctor (and herewith transmit) copies of the documents chiefly relied upon by the High Court of Admiralty in its recent judgments in the cases of neutral ships condemned for breaking the blockade of Russian ports in the Baltic. I have also procured (and herewith transmit) a copy of a printed report of the arguments and judgments in these blockade cases, which is about to be published by Dr. Deane. I have preferred to send it in its present shape to incurring further delay by waiting for its formal publication.

The affidavits of Mr. Hertslet, Lord Bloomfield, and Colonel Lloyd Hodges (copies sent herewith), together with the newspapers extracts annexed, clearly prove the notoriety of the blockade of the coast of Courland and Gulf of Riga throughout northern Germany by the end of April.

The affidavits of Messrs. Bischoff and Sloman establish the fact that intelligence is transmitted from Hamburgh to Copenhagen in sixty hours.

The affidavit of Mr. Lousada proves that the Danish Consul at Riga was officially informed of the blockade by him in April. The Danish Consuls at Riga and Memel must be presumed to have transmitted intelligence of the blockade to their Government, and must also have informed the Danish merchants and masters of the ships then at those ports thereof.

The extracts from the Danish newspapers (herewith) are not unimportant, and I would also advert to Captain Key's affidavit (which was not made in time to be brought before the Court) as proving that the Danish Government sent a ship of war (the "Thor") in May, not to inquire if there was a blockade, but to communicate with the commander of the "Blockading Squadron." I may add that the number of ships warned off and putting into neutral ports was so great as soon to make the blockade notorious throughout the Baltic (see printed Judgment, page 124). Mr. Bird's affidavit is decisive as to one of such vessels (the Danish vessel the "Jacgeven") which was warned off on the 18th April, and thereupon put into Memel, and which is afterwards, in May, proved to have been in the Danish port of Flensburgh (see the observations of the Court at pages 133 and 164).

Notoriety of the blockade.

I would also beg to refer to the observations of the Court in its judgments at pages 124, 129, 130, 132, 133, and 138, as to the evidence of the notoriety of the blockade. I own that in the face of this evidence I am unable to see how it is possible for the Danish Government to maintain that it was justified consistently with perfect truth and international good faith, in instructing Count Reventlow to declare to your Lordship officially in his note of the 28th September, 1854, "that the competent authorities in Denmark were ignorant of the blockade until June."

Conduct of Danish Government in pretending ignorance.

The Danish Government may have entertained some doubt as to its operation or effect; they may have thought themselves justified in ignoring it, but they could not have been ignorant of a fact which had been notorious at Hamburgh for more than a month (see page 129). This appears to me to be the true question, rather than what the Court may have thought or said with reference to the conduct or declarations of any of the Danish authorities. The evidence of these persons was relied upon by the claimants as exclusively establishing an honest bonâ fide and total ignorance of the existence of any blockade until June, and whatever observations were made by the Court on this point must be considered, with reference to the use endeavoured to be made by the claimants of the documents issued by the Danish authorities. The Danish Government, in Count Reventlow's note of the 28th September, appears to me to have gone further than any of their officers or authorities in denying all knowledge of the blockade until June. On this part of the case the merchants' Certificate E, annexed to the affidavit of Mr. May, was most strongly animadverted upon by the Count (see page 136). This document appears to have been applied for and obtained officially by the Danish Government, and by it sent to the Danish Legation here, from which it was forwarded to the claimant, in order that he might use it as evidence against the Crown, which he accordingly did. This was also the case as to the other official documents annexed to the affidavit of Mr. May. Under these circumstances the Danish Government can scarcely repudiate all responsibility for the credit or contents of such documents. The Court also remarked (page 135) upon the absence of any distinct Danish official statement of the blockade having been known in Denmark on any definite date, at or about the time when it was proved to have been known there, which it observed to be "unfortunately omitted," most especially in the document A (annexed to E, May's affidavit), being an official declaration from the Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Danish Custom house certificates (C and D annexed to the same affidavit) are also somewhat remarkable documents in connection with this subject. It is impossible that the Custom house could have been wholly ignorant of the blockade until June, and the document C only alleges the absence of official information, but does not deny that the fact was well known long before June.

Baron Oxholm appears, however, to me to have greatly misapprehended the ground of the judgment in this passage in his note; "la Cour de l'Amirauté n'hésite pourtant pas d'accuser de mauvaise foi les autorités Danoises pour avoir même antérieurement à cet aveu, exprimé des doutes au même sujet, et procède sur la base de cette mauvaise foi supposée à condamner tous les bâtiments capturés." The Court did not accuse any of the Danish authorities of bad faith. The Court did accuse the merchants signing the Certificate E of bad faith; but they are not "Danish authorities," and it certainly did not proceed on that ground to condemn all or any Danish ships. It condemned only those Danish ships whose masters were proved to have known of the blockade, to have falsely denied such knowledge, and to have endeavoured to break it, quite irrespectively of the good or bad faith of the Danish Government (see the "Franciska," page 155; the "Steen Bille," page 158; the "Union," page 160).

Fictitious sales of Russian ships to Danes.

I ought, perhaps, to remind your Lordship that there is another subject upon which the conduct of the Danish authorities in lending themselves to protect Russian interests appears to me to be open to just animadversion, to which I have, on more than one occasion, already alluded, and to which I shall probably be compelled again to allude hereafter, viz., the numerous cases of fictitious sales of Russian ships to Danish subjects. In one of these cases (the "Soglasie") all the papers have been printed by the Admiralty, and this case is a striking example of this class, but as many other Danish cases of the same character are still before the Court of Admiralty it would be premature to enter at present further into this subject.

---

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received April 9.)

Doctors' Commons, April 9, 1855.

My Lord,

Days of grace on re-establishment of blockade of Baltic.

Liability of vessels to capture primâ facie.

I AM honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 5th April stating that with reference to my letter of the 23rd ultimo,* reporting upon the question of egress of neutrals from Russian ports in the Baltic now about to be again blockaded, he was instructed by your Lordship to transmit to me drafts which have been founded thereon of letters to the Danish Minister and Hans Towns Consul General, and to request me to favour your Lordship with my opinion whether these drafts are right and proper or whether some alteration should not be made with reference to the passage in the inclosed printed "Memorandum on Blockades for the Officers of the Navy," which states that "egress should be permitted to neutrals and British or allied ships only when in ballast; all ships coming out laden are liable to capture primâ facie; and in the absence of special instructions or of a licence, it will rest with them to establish before the Prize Court that the cargo was laden on board before the blockade was established or that there exist any other special circumstances which entitle those interested to restoration." His Lordship also incloses a letter which was addressed to the Admiralty founded upon my report and a letter from the Admiralty stating that instructions had in consequence been given to Her Majesty's naval officers.

I have accordingly taken the papers in question into consideration and have the honour to report—

That I am of opinion that with the view of preventing misunderstanding some alteration of or addition to the drafts in question will be advisable with reference to the passage alluded to in the (printed) "Memorandum on Blockades." I would venture to suggest that an addition of a general character may be sufficient to the effect that "Her Majesty's Government must of course reserve and act upon its undoubted belligerent right of detaining and sending before a competent court for adjudication any vessel which may leave a blockaded port after the commencement of a blockade; and it will be for the parties interested to establish before such court the particular circumstances on which they may rely as entitling them to restitution either of the ship or the cargo.

With reference to the letters to and from the Admiralty, I have to observe that great discretion was shown last year in this class of cases by the naval officers blockading Riga especially, and that much must necessarily be left to their discretion. On the one hand, it is obvious that the mere assertion of the neutral master will not be sufficient to exempt the ship from capture; on the other hand, naval officers (who capture at their own risk) would probably abstain from capture in cases which appeared to them free from suspicion or doubt.

If the Admiralty should be of opinion that either the instructions which they have issued (and which I have not seen) or the memorandum above alluded to may be liable to misconception, fresh instructions may of course be issued; but they must be of a very general character, as I have above indicated.

Naval officer not bound to capture in all cases.

The neutral coming out of a blockaded port is by international law liable to capture; but the blockading officer is not bound to capture vessels of whose innocence he may be satisfied. He may (and he generally does in practice), exercise considerable discrimination, especially at the commencement of a blockade of a port in which he knows neutrals to have entered previously, and to have been engaged in loading outwards when the blockade commenced.

My Lord,

Queen's Proclamation against assisting the enemy.

How does it affect Ionians, &c.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th March last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Varna respecting Her Majesty's proclamation warning British subjects against adhering to and assisting the Queen's enemies, and with reference to that passage in this despatch in which Colonel Neale requests to be informed "whether British protected subjects, as Ionians, are in any degree liable under the Proclamation to be proceeded against for the committal of any of the treasonable acts therein referred to;" and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer to be returned to Colonel Neale, and whether protection should not in all cases be withdrawn from Ionians aiding and abetting the enemy.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Wants assistance of Law Officers.

That in the case of the Ionian ship "Lencade," which has recently been argued, and in which judgment will soon be delivered in the High Court of Admiralty, various questions affecting the political "status" of Ionians and their relation to the protecting Sovereign have been raised, and some of these will probably be decided by that judgment. It will be, therefore, highly desirable to wait for that judgment before answering Lieutenant-Colonel Neale's letter, if your Lordship should be able, without serious inconvenience, so to do. In any event I must, however, request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General in dealing with this subject.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received April 13.)

Doctors' Commons, April 11, 1855.

My Lord,

Rye at Eupatoria, Dutch property.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th March last, stating that, with reference to my report of the 26th,* he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, respecting another cargo of rye at Eupatoria, concerning which details are given, and to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's note into consideration, together with the former papers, and that I would inform your Lordship of my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Baron Bentinck.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I observe that the rye in question is stated to have been bought at Eupatoria for exportation, and paid for by the widow Doorbosch in October, 1853, and its exportation having been, as alleged, prevented by a Russian ukase (the date of which is not given) it remained in a warehouse at Eupatoria (in whose actual possession or custody I do not understand), when that place was taken possession of by the allies in September, 1854.

It does not appear that any active steps have been taken in the matter, or any application made to any British authority up to the present time. This is somewhat singular, and has not a very favourable aspect.

Under these circumstances, Baron Bentinck applies to your Lordship to be furnished with information as to what has become of the rye in question, for permission to the widow Doorbosch to export it if it is still at Eupatoria, and that if it shall turn out to have been disposed of by the British military authorities, the cost of it may be repaid to her.

Her Majesty's Government cannot give information respecting.

I cannot recommend your Lordship to comply with this request. This is not by any means a very peculiar case, or the only case of its class, as appears from my report of March 5,† on Baron Bentinck's application on behalf of Messrs. Kaars, Syperstein and Co., and it appears to me very unreasonable to expect that Her Majesty's Government should now procure and supply detailed information as to the actual state of each separate portion of neutral property (especially cereal productions) which may have been in Eupatoria in September, 1854, with a view of furnishing evidence to support, as against itself, claims for compensation on the part of the neutral owners thereof.

Onus of proof rests with the claimant.

I am of opinion that in cases where neutrals may claim from one belligerent compensation for loss or appropriation of their property situated in the country of the other belligerent, the neutral claimant is bound to begin by establishing, at least, a primâ facie case, and either to identify or to trace his property, or to give some account of its actual condition, or of the manner and circumstances of its appropriation or destruction in the first instance. The burden of proof lies upon him, and he cannot fairly shift that burden or call upon the belligerent to establish or to assist in establishing a case against himself.

I may also observe that should it turn out that the rye in question had been legally and actually taken possession of by or on behalf of the Russian Government before the capture of Eupatoria, it will by such capture lawfully become booty of war, and the original owner would have no claim against Her Majesty's Government in respect of it.

It may also have been plundered by the native population, or have been seized or disposed of by the French, or the Turks, or it may be still in existence, but not in the possession of the British forces. Whatever may have been the actual circumstances attending the original capture and subsequent occupation of Eupatoria by the allies, or the manner in which the cereal property found therein was treated or disposed of (with which I am not acquainted), I presume that the place being now occupied by a Turkish force, and the scene of active operations, it is practically impossible for Her Majesty's Government to give any permission to export the grain therefrom, or even to supply any information as to the existing regulations on that subject. Eupatoria being an open port, the widow Doorbosch can have no very insuperable difficulty in ascertaining what has become of her rye, or of exporting it if such exportation is permitted; if such exportation be forbidden, there does not appear to me to be any reason for making an exception in her favour. I would further venture to suggest that Her Majesty's Government, by giving the information requested, might not improbably assist in furnishing evidence in support of a claim against its allies, which it ought not to do.

Answer for Netherlands Minister.

I would, therefore, suggest that Baron Bentinck may be informed that Her Majesty's Government regrets that it cannot comply with his request, that it sees no very special or exceptional circumstances in favour of the applicant in this particular case, and that even if it had the means (which it has not) of so doing, yet that it could not be fairly required to furnish evidence to found or support a claim against itself or its allies, and that, if the applicant has any claim against Her Majesty's Government, the "onus" of establishing and supporting such claim lies upon her, and cannot properly be transferred to Her Majesty's Government.

It will, of course, be for your Lordship to decide what should be the tenour of the answer which Baron Bentinck is to receive, I have only indicated the general principles which appear to me to apply to this class of cases.

My Lord,

Dutch vessels unavoidably detained at Kertch.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 9th April instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 5th, requesting my opinion as to the answers to be returned to the Danish Minister and Agent of the Hans Towns, with respect to the blockade in the Baltic, he was directed to transmit to me a note from Baron Bentinck, the Netherlands Minister at this Court, stating the circumstances under which the Dutch vessels "l'Helena Catharina" and "Graaf Van Limburg Stirum," which arrived at Kertch in December last, have been unavoidably detained at that port, and requesting that those vessels may be allowed to leave Kertch without any obstacle being offered to their doing so.

Lord Wodehouse also incloses a note from the French Ambassador at this Court, inclosing the draft of answer which the French Government propose to return to a similar representation addressed to the French Government by the Netherlands Minister at Paris, and in transmitting these papers your Lordship desires him to state to me that it is proposed to allow these vessels to depart in ballast only, but that your Lordship would wish to have my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government ought to concur in the terms of the draft of answer proposed by the French Government.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May be allowed to leave in ballast.

That it does not appear to me desirable that Her Majesty's Government should concur in the precise terms of the draft answer proposed by the French Government; and that it will be proper to inform Baron Bentinck that the two vessels in question will, under the circumstances set forth, and in full reliance on the entire accuracy of his Excellency's statement thereof, be permitted to leave Kertch in ballast only without interruption.

Your Lordship will doubtless make a communication to the Admiralty, in order to insure the uninterrupted egress of these vessels from Kertch.

My Lord,

Application of a Russian clergyman for passports to come to England en route for Cape of Good Hope.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 31st March last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Joseph Soul, stating the circumstances under which he applies for passports to enable the Rev. Hugo Hahn, a Russian subject, to come to England with his wife; and to request that I would take Mr. Soul's letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether there is any legal objection to complying with his request.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken Mr. Soul's letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No legal objection, if bonâ fide,

That, provided that your Lordship is satisfied that the Rev. M. Hahn (who appears to be a Russian subject, and at present resident in Russia) is desirous of coming to England only in order to proceed immediately to the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, and for the sole purpose of continuing his missionary services to the natives there, there will be no legal objection to your Lordship's permitting him so to do.

M. Hahn, however, is not directly applying to your Lordship, nor does any application on his behalf appear to have been made by the authorities at the Cape or by any religious or missionary society, which is somewhat singular. Mr. Soul's statement and application, with reference to him, is very vague; he does not state that he is making this application by M. Hahn's desire, nor does he offer any references as to M. Hahn's real character and designs; his suggestion that "a free passage is open through England to every servant of the Lord Jesus" (if it has any serious or definite meaning whatever), cannot be acceded to as a general principle in the case of Russian subjects.

but draws attention to disturbed state of frontier of Cape Colony.

Your Lordship may possibly, under these circumstances, think proper to require some further references or information before acceding to Mr. Soul's request, in order at all events to secure the identification of M. Hahn, and to prevent any undue advantage being taken of your Lordship's permission. I may perhaps be excused for respectfully suggesting to your Lordship that the state of affairs on the Caffre frontier of the Cape Colony is such as to require great caution in permitting any direct communication from Russia to that Colony.

Doctors' Commons, April 21, 1855.

My Lord,

With reference to the Judgment of the High Court of Admiralty in the Baltic blockade cases (of which an authentic report has been recently published) and also with reference to the concluding passage in General Oxholm's note to your Lordship of the 13th April: "En réservant au Gouvernement du Roi de réclamer contre la non-observation des Traités qui existent entre les deux pays, et qui devraient garantir mes nationaux du malheur qui les a frappés," I beg to call your Lordship's attention to the arguments of counsel and to the Judgment of the Court as to these Treaties (with Denmark of 1670 and Sweden of 1661). The opinion of the Court on these Treaties is expressed at page 139 and following pages of that Report.† It will be perceived that the claimants' counsel raised the question of the operation and effect of these Treaties not in the first instance, nor until after the "further proof" had been ordered by the Court. See especially, Dr. Twiss, pages 9, 13, 29, 72. In accordance with information with which I was supplied from the Foreign Office, and with the able assistance of Dr. Jenner and Dr. Deane, I answered these arguments to the best of my ability, arguing that the Treaties in question were in effect to be considered as obsolete, abrogated by subsequent Acts, and not now in operation, referring particularly to the Convention of 1801 between Great Britain and Russia (subsequently acceded to by Denmark and by Sweden), observing that the Danish and Swedish Governments did not appear to have made any formal demand founded upon those Treaties either for the liberation of the particular ships in question or of any other ships during the present war, or for compensation for their having been captured in violation of those Treaties; and also remarking upon the qualified certificate given by the Danish Legation (see page 72), and also on the Danish Letters Patent of 1854 (reviving the Ordinance of 1803), and the Swedish Ordinance of the same date, as being apparently inconsistent with the existence of those Treaties, or at all events with the construction sought to be given to them by the claimants' counsel; and we added generally on behalf of the Crown such other arguments as occurred to us. Notes of these arguments will be found at pages 2, 13, 19, 32, 72, 74, 76.

Report of Danish and Swedish prize cases.

Opinion of Court.

Vessels not captured in violation of Treaties, but Treaties are still in force.

In commenting upon these arguments the Court made no direct reference to the Danish Letters Patent of 1854 (revising the Ordinance of 1803) which are most important documents, perhaps, because they were not contained in the evidence adduced in any of the causes; it however decided that none of the ships in question had been captured in violation of Treaty, and it threw considerable doubt upon the practical effect or operation of these Treaties so far as relates to any particular privileges being thereby conceded to Danish or Swedish ships with reference to blockades; but at the same time the Court expressed its decided opinion that the Treaties were not obsolete or abrogated, but were still in existence.

It is to be observed that none of the vessels in question had the Latin sea passes required by the Treaty with Denmark and by the Danish law. Whilst, therefore, the existence of these Treaties may be considered as established by the Judgment, the construction of them contended for on behalf of the claimants (who were assisted by the Danish Legation) is thereby negatived, and the Court expressed the strongest opinion that no violation of them had been committed by Her Majesty's Government in any of the cases then before it.

It is impossible to say at present whether any of these Judgments will be appealed against, or what may be the result of such appeal.

Danish charge of violation of Treaties.

I have however considered it my duty to lay these circumstances before your Lordship, inasmuch as the charge of deliberate violation of these Treaties originally and distinctly made by the claimants' counsel, appears to me to be, notwithstanding the Judgment, now formally repeated by General Oxholm, possibly with a view to future contingencies; and it will be for your Lordship to determine whether this charge should be passed over in silence, or whether any and what steps should be taken in reference to the charge, or to the Treaties.

As to taking notice of.

I am not aware what course the Swedish Legation has pursued in this matter, and I am ignorant of the course which the Danish Government may have heretofore taken upon this question. If the charge of violating these Treaties by the particular captures in question is now distinctly made by the Danish Government for the first time, it obviously now comes too late and with a very bad grace after M. de Scheel's expressly acknowledging to Mr. Buchanan "the justice of the decision of the Admiralty Court in all the cases with which he is acquainted," including, of course, those now alluded to.

My Lord,

Blockade of coast of Courland.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a copy of a telegraphic despatch received from the British Vice-Consul at Königsberg, reporting the coast of Courland to be effectually blockaded by Her Majesty's advanced squadron off Libau, on the 20th April instant; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and draw up and transmit to your Lordship a proper notification of this blockade if I was of opinion that it should be inserted in the "London Gazette," as requested by the Admiralty.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That the telegraphic notice inclosed does not appear to me to be sufficient to enable me to prepare a notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

I observe:—

No dates given.

1. That it does not state on and from what date the blockade actually commenced.

1853-56

2. It is not in the form or to the effect of the notification appended to the confidential Memorandum on Blockade printed by the Admiralty.

3. I do not feel certain that in its present form it comes directly and officially from Captain Watson to the Admiralty, or was meant by him to be transmitted in that precise form. It was, I presume, originally addressed by Captain Watson to Mr. Consul Hertslet, and was forwarded by him to Mr. Consul Brockmann, who appears to have transmitted it on his own responsibility, but this is not quite clear.

Too vague for publication in "Gazette."

4. "The coast of Courland" appears to me to be a vague description (under the circumstances) of the actual limits of the blockade. It seems improbable that the whole coast of Courland and no portion of Livonia should have been blockaded on and from one and the same day at this season. It does not appear what ports were included or how far to the northward or eastward the blockade extends. If it includes the whole coast of Courland it must include the Lyseroot Channel and some portion of the Gulf of Riga, and it appears singular that the blockade should in that case not include Riga itself, which it was last year shown could be effectually blockaded by ships cruising off Lyseroot. If only a portion of the coast of Courland (and not the whole of the coast of that Province) is, in fact, blockaded (which I suspect to be the case) then the notice is not accurate. I am quite aware of the serious consequences of delaying the publication of the notification; on the other hand the consequences of publishing an incorrect or defective notification are also very serious. I trust that a more correct and formal notification will be instantly required from Captain Watson, and will shortly arrive; and upon the whole I consider it more prudent to wait (at all events for a few days) for the chance of further and more accurate information which will doubtless be promptly required from all concerned than to run the risk of publishing so very defective a notification as this would prove.

Urges necessity of accuracy.

I have repeatedly called attention to the necessity for strict accuracy on the part of naval officers in all notices of blockade, and have explained the requisite contents of such notices, especially in the printed Memorandum, of which I presume Captain Watson, and every Captain in the Baltic, is furnished with a copy, and I trust that this will be strictly attended to or I much fear that the most serious public inconvenience will result.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of this day's date, transmitting further papers from the Admiralty, relative to the blockade of Courland.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have prepared and herewith transmit a draft notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

Mistakes in names.

As to inclusion of Riga, &c.

I presume that the word written "Tilsirs" and "Silsund" is, in fact, "Filsand," one of the most known positions in the Baltic, and I have amended it accordingly; any such mistakes may cause serious inconvenience. The actual blockade of Riga and Peman and of all the ports in the Gulf of Riga is not distinctly announced. I presume that these ports were, at the date in question, either in effect blockaded or closed by ice, and that there is practically no access to them at any season through the north entrance of the Gulf of Riga, between the Islands of Dago and Osel and the main land.

In the event of a closer or more complete blockade of Riga, or of ports in that gulf being subsequently established, care should be taken that in formally announcing it no doubt is thrown upon the validity or date of the blockade of the entrance of the Gulf of Riga, now declared.

It may also be worth while to inquire under what circumstances the previous official (but defective) notice of this blockade reported on by me on the 24th April instant was transmitted, with the view of preventing similar mistakes in future. Probably some communication should be made to the French Government on the subject of this notification. No French ships of war appear to be on the spot.

Misprint of date.

WITH reference to my report of the 27th April instant, and to the draft notification sent therewith of the blockade of the coast of Courland, I remark that the "London Gazette" of the 27th has printed the date of Captain Watson's letter as "off Liban 18*th April*," instead of "off Liban 19*th April*;" which (19th) would clearly appear to be the correct date, as I presume will turn out to be the case on reference to the original letter, as I find "19th" in my rough draft of the notification; the "18th" may have been inserted (by error) in the copy sent to your Lordship. This error, however, arising is not unimportant, and should be forthwith corrected.

My Lord,

Vessels of allies trading with enemy's unblockaded ports.

IT has become necessary that I should apply to your Lordship as to the views of Her Majesty's Government upon the extent and effect of the Order in Council of April 15, 1854 (No. 12) as to the vessels and cargoes of Her Majesty's Allies in the war trading with the enemy's ports not blockaded. Before that Order the vessel of an ally in the war trading with the common enemy would have been just as liable to capture by and condemnation to a British cruizer as a British vessel would have been under the same circumstances. That order, however, appears to me to have been intended to permit and encourage trading with the enemy by allies as well as by Asks policy of Her Majesty's Government with reference to Order in Council, for guidance in prize cases.

British subjects. The words "neutral or friendly," frequently repeated therein, and the solitary exception of "British vessels entering or communicating with ports or places in the occupation or possession of Her Majesty's enemies," appear to me to be strongly in favour of this construction. However this may be, I fear that it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to contend successfully for a different judicial interpretation of the order, or to secure the condemnation of a French, Turkish, or Sardinian vessel if captured for trading with the enemy; and I do not see how it could be expedient or even proper on my part (as Counsel for the Crown) to make any such attempt, if the bonâ fide purpose and intention of Her Majesty's Government when it issued this order (which was doubtless founded upon reasons of public policy and adopted after mature deliberation and communication with Her Majesty's allies and probably adhered to by those allies) was clearly (as I presume it still is) in favour of permitting trade with the common enemy by the allies as well as by British subjects. It can scarcely be supposed that we meant to interdict to our allies that trade which we permitted to our subjects, or that our allies were to interrupt a trade carried on by our subjects which our own officers were to permit.

Unless, therefore, I should be favoured with instructions to the contrary, I propose not to raise the point, and if I should be compelled to make any statement in Court upon it, to admit, on behalf of the Crown, that trading with the enemy by allies as well as by subjects is permited by the Order in Council.

I am not aware what may be the law and practice adopted by the French or Turkish or Sardinian Governments, or what instructions (if any) may have issued from the Admiralty on this point. The desirableness of uniformity, and perhaps also of issuing instructions to naval officers, will be at once apparent to your Lordship. The question has not as yet directly arisen in the Prize Court, but it is not improbable that it may arise suddenly and soon, and I have therefore thought it my duty to trouble your Lordship with this communication, which expresses the views of the Admiralty Advocate as well as those of your Lordship's, &c.

My Lord,

Egress from Russian ports after re-establishment of blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th April last stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Danish Minister at this Court requesting an explanation of the reservation contained in the note addressed to him on the 11th April, with respect to the egress of neutral vessels from Russian ports in the Baltic after the re-establishment by the allies of the blockade of those ports.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to transmit to me the note to General Oxholm to which he refers, together with my report on which that note was founded,* and to request that I would report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the reply to be returned to General Oxholm.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I would in the first place respectfully venture to express my doubts whether General Oxholm can fairly require to be informed of the precise instructions (if any) which may have been actually issued, or of those which may be hereafter issued to Her Majesty's naval officers upon this point, and my still graver doubts whether in any event it will be right or proper for your Lordship to give him the information which he seeks. I confess that the real object of his Excellency's inquiry appears to me to be not so much to elicit information, as to obtain some admission from Her Majesty's Government which may be not improbably communicated to Danish claimants, and made the ground of future applications.

As to object of Danish Minister in asking such questions.

I have further to state that I am not aware whether any and what instructions have been issued by the Admiralty on this subject, and to point out that in the absence of any definite instructions, and in cases to which they may not extend, the officers actually engaged in blockading and the Admiral commanding in chief, must necessarily act upon their own discretion in each case as it may arise.

I have further to observe that neutral vessels which may have entered Russian ports flagrante bello, and with full knowledge that a blockade would be reimposed by the allies at the earliest practicable period, do not appear to me to be entitled to any consideration; they are in a very different position from those which were surprised in the enemies' ports by the breaking out of war; they have for purposes of profit voluntarily incurred the risk of capture, and they have to the utmost of their power given aid and assistance to Russian interests, which interests will be further promoted by any further indulgence shown to him. It is also to be borne in mind that any exception or concession will be eagerly relied upon and endeavoured to be extended, and will infallibly give rise to many applications from neutrals. The concessions already made in favour of commerce by Her Majesty are so great that blockade thereby loses much of its effect upon the enemy, and any further concessions will further tend to impair its efficacy, and, so far, to increase the enemy's resources.

Vessels entering flagrante bello not entitled to consideration.

Denmark has no claim to indulgence.

The Danish flag has (as I have frequently pointed out) already obtained a most singular pre-eminence in covering Russian property and promoting Russian interests, and I conceive that even if indulgence should be shown to some neutrals, none should be displayed to Denmark (see for instance Colonel Lloyd Hodges' No. 76, July 5, 1854, with papers in the case of the "Hebe" or "Therese"). The circumstances of the times would, therefore, in my opinion, fully justify Her Majesty's Government in exercising its strict legal right of ordering every laden vessel without exception, and at all events every Danish vessel, taken coming out of a blockaded port in the Baltic, to be sent to England for adjudication.

I ought, however, to observe that although the law as laid down by the highest authorities hitherto is in favour of the abstract right of blockading officers to send in for adjudication all laden vessels without exception coming out of a blockaded port without risk of costs and damages, yet, that after the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council reversing that of the High Court of Admiralty in the "Ostsee," officers will in my opinion carry out that right in some cases at considerable risk; but this is a point upon which neutral Governments are by no means without good information and advice, and one which Her Majesty's Government may rather desire to leave to the determination of the Prize Courts, than to take upon itself to determine by making any further concessions which would appear to be the less needed, if the Prize Courts should take a more favourable view than formerly of neutral claims. As a general principle blockading officers capture in each particular case on their own individual responsibility, and are liable to the claimants in costs and damages, if they make captures without sufficient justification, technically called "probable cause." Each case which may arise will be determined by the Prize Courts upon its own circumstances, and it is not to be presumed that any officers acting under such serious practical responsibility will wantonly send vessels to England for adjudication without "probable cause." I apprehend, therefore, that if General Oxholm's question is in your Lordship's opinion one proper to be answered by your Lordship, the answer must be to the effect "that Her Majesty's officers are authorized to exercise a reasonable discretion upon the spot in every case, and are not bound by their instructions to send to England every vessel coming out of a blockaded port without exception;" but such an answer, however true in fact, may hereafter expose the blockading officers and Her Majesty's Government to serious inconvenience, and the propriety of giving it will be, of course, a matter entirely for your Lordship's decision.

Naval officers capture at their own risk.

Not advisable to tell Danish Minister.

My Lord,

Egress from Russian ports on re-establishment of a blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th April last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, requesting to be informed whether, in the event of a fresh blockade of the Russian ports in the Baltic, neutral vessels will be allowed time to leave the blockaded ports in ballast, or with the cargoes which they may have taken on board before the establishment of a blockade.

Baron Bentinck further asks whether, in case neutral vessels should be allowed to leave Russian ports in ballast or with cargoes, the commanders of the allied cruizers will be instructed to permit those vessels to proceed after having visited them and ascertained that their papers are in proper order, or whether each neutral vessel under these circumstances will be brought to this country to be tried by the Court of Admiralty.

And Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's note into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion as to the answer which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

Capture of neutrals in ballast exceptional.

Vessels with cargoes must be sent home for adjudication.

That Baron Bentinck may be informed that, in the absence of any special instructions or arrangements (of the existence of which I am not aware), no particular time will be allowed for neutrals to leave blockaded ports, either in ballast or with cargoes laden before the blockade commenced; that it is only under exceptional circumstances that neutrals leaving blockaded ports in ballast will be captured, but that, with respect to all vessels leaving such ports with cargoes (whensoever laden), it being clearly competent to Her Majesty, by the law of nations, to send all such vessels to England for adjudication, Her Majesty's Government is not disposed to make any special concessions in favour of those neutrals who have, with a view to commercial profit, deliberately and flagrante bello incurred the risk of blockade and capture by trading with a belligerent, and who may fairly be left to suffer from the natural results of their conduct, subject to the equitable decisions of the British Prize Courts, before which they will have the fullest opportunity of establishing their claim to any compensation to which they may consider themselves entitled.

I would beg particularly to refer to my report of the 1st May* on a similar application from the Danish Minister, and to state that the Netherlands flag has hitherto maintained a much more creditable position than that of Denmark, at least so far as Russian interests are concerned. It is true that some of the Netherlands vessels broke the Baltic blockades last year, but the Netherlands official personages do not appear (like those of Denmark) to have denied all knowledge of those blockades, or to have allowed the Netherlands flag to be used systematically to cover and protect Russian interests.

My Lord,

Instructions to Consuls to administer oaths for affidavits to be produced in Prize Courts.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th April last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter Mr. Rothery, Proctor, requesting that, under the circumstances therein stated, immediate instructions may be issued to all Her Majesty's Consuls and Vice-Consuls abroad, more particularly to those at Copenhagen, Elsinore, and Constantinople, directing them to administer oaths with reference to affidavits prepared abroad for production in the Admiralty Prize Courts of this country; the issue of such instructions being requested in order to remove all doubts on the part of any Consuls or Vice-Consuls as to their power to administer oaths; and to request that I would take this application into consideration and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion whether there is any objection to its being complied with, and if there is not any, in what form the instructions should be given.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this application into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No objection, but they generally do so.

That if your Lordship considers it proper to issue such instructions, I see no objection thereto; and that I would venture to suggest that, in any such instructions, it may be sufficient to call the attention of Her Majesty's Consuls and Vice-Consuls to the 7th section of the "Admiralty Court Act, 1855" (17 and 18 Vict., cap. 78), and to direct them to act regularly in accordance therewith, as in several instances they have already done.

I may add that, in many recent prize cases, such affidavits have been made before Consuls and Vice-Consuls; one was made, for instance, in the "Soglasie,"† on the 13th November, 1854, before Consul Taylor, at Copenhagen. Nor am I aware of any objection having been hitherto made by any Consul or Vice-Consul to take such affidavits, or of any doubt or difficulty having hitherto arisen on the subject; it is possible that there may have been some special reason for the refusal which Mr. Rothery's correspondent has experienced in this case.

My Lord,

Russian vessel "Hebe" transferred to Lubeck flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th April last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Hamburgh, inclosing a copy of a letter from Captain Watson, of Her Majesty's ship "Impérieuse," reporting the circumstances under which he had intercepted and examined the vessel "Hebe" on the passage of that vessel from Lubeck to Copenhagen, and further to transmit to me the former despatches relative to the transfer of this vessel from the Russian to the Lubeck flag, referred to in Colonel Hodges' despatch, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon the transaction respecting the "Hebe," and the course pursued by Captain Watson on this occasion.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Suspicious. Might have been captured.

That the date and circumstances of the sale of this vessel appears to be open to suspicion, and to be such as would, in my opinion, have justified her capture last year under the principles laid down in the Law Officers' Report of the 24th May, 1854,* on the subject of sales of Russian ships to citizens of Lubeck, more especially as Her Majesty's Consul at Lubeck appears to be convinced she was not purchased bonâ fide.

I observe, however, that she has been visited and examined at least twice by Her Majesty's ships:—

1st. By Captain Watson about the 17th May, 1854 (see Colonel Hodges' No. 26, 22nd April, 1855); and,

2nd. By Captain Watson, with the assistance of two other Captains, on the 15th April last.

These officers at that time had full information concerning her. They carefully examined her papers, and probably examined her master. They had a strong interest in her proving a good prize, but, nevertheless, did not consider it prudent to capture her.

Under these circumstances, although I do not myself clearly see why she was not captured (more especially when met with last year), I do not consider that this is a case which clearly calls for the issue of any special instructions; after her having been twice examined and permitted to pass by Her Majesty's vessels of war, any officer now capturing her will do so at some risk.

If Her Majesty's Government order her capture, and indemnify the captor, she may turn out a good prize.

If, however, Her Majesty's Government should think proper to order this vessel to be captured (indemnifying the captor), she may ultimately turn out to be a good prize.

It appears to me to be doubtful, from the last paragraph but one of Captain Watson's letter to the Admiralty of the 16th April, whether he has received a correct copy of the Law Officers' Report of the 24th May, 1854, or, if so, whether he has correctly apprehended its meaning.

My Lord,

Evidence given in Danish Court by British Vice-Consul against British Crown.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th April last, stating that with reference to my letter of the 17th February,† suggesting that Mr. Larlham, the British Vice-Consul at Elsinore, should be called upon to explain the circumstances under which he appeared as a witness in a Danish Court in the case of the "Stein Bill" he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a letter which has been received from Mr. Larlham, explaining his proceedings in this matter, and to state that it appears to your Lordship that Mr. Larlham's explanation is satisfactory, but before saying so to Mr. Larlham, your Lordship wishes to know whether I concur in your Lordship's views.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Mr. Larlham's explanation satisfactory, but he should first have communicated with Foreign Office.

That Mr. Larlham's explanation appears to me to be satisfactory, but that it would have been better if, before appearing in the Danish Court, he had communicated to your Lordship the application of Mr. Andersen. That communication might then have been embodied in an affidavit, to which he (Mr. Larlham) might have sworn, and which could have been made use of by the Crown. His evidence, as taken in the Danish Court, has, in fact, been used, and will probably be again used with considerable effect against the Crown and in favour of the Danish claimant, and of this result it may be desirable that he should be informed for his future guidance.

My Lord,

Russian vessel "Sigrid" at Elsinore made over to British subject in payment of debt.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th April last, stating that with reference to my report of the 28th March,‡ respecting Mr. Walker's request to be allowed, under the circumstances stated by him, to bring to this country, and to register the Russian brig "Sigrid," he was directed to transmit to me, with the former papers, the accompanying despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Elsinore regarding the vessel in question, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether this vessel should be given up to Mr. Walker, if the French Government concur, and whether it will be requisite to require from Mr. Walker any security in this case, about which your Lordship knows nothing beyond what is stated in Mr. Walker's letter of March last.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

No objection, if French Government concur, to coming to England to be registered.

That provided your Lordship sees fit to grant Mr. Walker the special favour for which he applies, and provided the French Government concur, I am of opinion that the "Sigrid" may be given up to Mr. Walker in order that he may bring her to England to be registered. A communication should be made to the Customs, with reference to any security to be required from Mr. Walker, for which I do not otherwise see any necessity.

But there is no proof of bona fides.

The bona fides of the transaction seems to rest at present solely on Mr. Walker's assertion, no correspondence, vouchers, or documents of any sort being exhibited, and neither the name of his Russian debtor, nor the date or amount of his debt being stated by him.

Such a transfer would be liable to investigation in a Prize Court, if in England.

I ought, perhaps, to remind your Lordship that a number of neutral ships, especially Danish ships, have been seized in British ports on suspicion of having been only colourably transferred from Russian owners (some have been condemned, other cases are still pending), and it will be for your Lordship to consider whether the special interference of Her Majesty's Government in Mr. Walker's favour, by which a transfer otherwise liable to strict investigation in a Prize Court, will be, to a certain extent, sanctioned and legalized, will have a perfectly consistent appearance, or be advisable under existing circumstances, as the "Sigrid" is lying under Russian colours at Elsinore. This is, however, not a legal question, and beyond my province.

Blockade of Gulf of Finland.

As to fresh notification by Admiral Dundas.

I AM honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th May instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to me, for my information, a copy of a telegraphic despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, reporting that Admiral Dundas has issued a notification of the blockade of the Gulf of Finland, which is intended to supersede the one already issued by Captain Watson.

With reference thereto I have the honour to report—

Stop it, Her Majesty's Government having acted on former one.

That inasmuch as Mr. Buchanan gives no intimation of the Admiral's reasons for considering Captain Watson's notification of blockade invalid, or for his having cancelled it, I can only suggest that inasmuch as Her Majesty's Government have treated Captain Watson's notification as valid and acted upon that presumption, such notification should not be invalidated or altered or cancelled without a previous communication with, and instructions to that effect from Her Majesty's Government.

Possibly instructions to this effect can be sent by telegraph, especially to Copenhagen and Memel, which are the most important points for this purpose. I shall anxiously wait for full particulars from the Admiralty on this important subject, and it is certainly unfortunate that a blockade having apparently commenced in the Baltic on April 17, Her Majesty's Government should up to this date be without any direct official communication from the Admiral on the subject.

As to placing ships just inside the Sound, to warn vessels.

I trust, however, that the Admiral has (agreeably to my suggestions to him and to the Admiralty) left one or more ships cruizing just inside the Sound, which will board, warn, and endorse the papers, of all vessels proceeding eastwards, by which many doubts and difficulties will be practically avoided.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 31st of March last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying despatch and its inclosures, from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, on the subject of an Ordonnance lately issued by the French Minister of Marine, prescribing the search of all foreign vessels leaving Havre, with the view to prevent the escape on board such vessels of deserters and persons liable to conscription, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the grounds on which this Ordonnance could be protested against.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Queen's Proclamation against assisting the enemy. How does it affect Ionians?

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 14th April last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Varna, respecting Her Majesty's Proclamation warning British subjects against adhering to or assisting the Queen's enemies; and, with reference to that passage in that despatch, in which Colonel Neale requests to be informed "whether British protected subjects, as Ionians, are in any degree liable under the Proclamation to be proceeded against for the committal of any of the treasonable acts therein referred to," Lord Wodehouse is pleased to request that we would report our opinion as to the answer to be returned to Colonel Neale, and whether protection should not in all cases be withdrawn from Ionians aiding and abetting the enemy.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Ionians not neutrals, but still of different status to British subjects.

Protection may be withdrawn for infraction of the Proclamation.

That, although we retain the opinion we expressed on a former occasion,* that the Ionian Republic, being under the protection and subject to the executive authority of the British Crown, is not at liberty to consider itself a neutral State, or to enter into commercial or friendly relations with Her Majesty's enemies; yet, we think that the "status" of a native of the Ionian Republic under the protection of the British Crown is very different from the "status" of a natural born English subject, and that Ionians, being under the protection of the British Crown, are not in any degree liable, under the Proclamation, to be proceeded against for the committal of any of the treasonable acts therein referred to, but that it will be proper to declare that the protection of the British Crown will be withdrawn from all Ionians in any manner aiding or abetting Her Majesty's enemies.

Russian vessel "Hebe" transferred to Lubeck flag.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th of May instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 27th ultimo, inclosing a despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Hamburgh, reporting the examination by Captain Watson, of Her Majesty's ship "Impérieuse," of the vessel "Hebe," on the passage of that vessel from Lubeck to Copenhagen, together with the previous papers relative to the transfer of that vessel from the Russian to the Lubeck flag, he was directed to inclose a letter from the Agent and Consul-General of the Hans Towns, protesting against this examination on the part of Her Majesty's cruizers, and requesting that the original orders, in consequence of which this vessel was detained, might be rescinded, and that the ship's papers might be examined, with a view to prevent any future detention of this vessel; and Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course to be pursued in this case, and whether the observations in Mr. Colquhoun's letter make any change in my opinion of the case, as contained in my letter of the 3rd instant.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, with reference to the course to be pursued in this case, I can only refer to my previous report of the 3rd instant.* Mr. Colquhoun's application for a special protection to be issued in favour of this vessel cannot be granted. Mr. Colquhoun's letter, and the abstract of ship's papers transmitted by him, rather confirm than change my previous opinion of the suspicious aspect of the alleged transfer of the vessel from the Russian to the Lubeck flag.

Capture is legally justifiable, but risky.

I am of opinion that her capture would be legally justifiable, but I cannot say with any confidence that she will be ultimately condemned; and, after all that has occurred, any captor of this ship must incur some risk of costs and damages. Of the expediency of issuing special orders for her capture, Her Majesty's Government must be the best judges.

My Lord,

Russian vessels transferred to Norwegian subjects exposed to annoyance on arriving in England.

Complaint of Norwegian Minister.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Swedish and Norwegian Minister at this Court, stating that ships bought in Russia, but which have become bonâ fide the property of Norwegian subjects, are exposed to annoyance and inconvenience from the Custom-house authorities when they arrive in British ports; and to request that I would take Baron Hochschild's letter into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to whether the certificate which such vessels are compelled to carry, and which is only delivered to Norwegian subjects, is not sufficient evidence of their nationality.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the pass or certificate ("permis Royal") will not be of itself sufficient evidence of the entire good faith of the purchase from a Russian, or that there is no enemy's interest still remaining in the ship.

Cases must be investigated to prevent necessity of sending ships before Prize Court.

It may be perhaps further explained to the Swedish and Norwegian Minister that the measures of which he complains, viz., the inspection of the ship's papers, and the asking some questions of the masters, were taken for the express purpose of avoiding the necessity which might otherwise have arisen of arresting the ships in question, and instituting proceedings against them in the Prize Court, in order to obtain a complete investigation into the alleged purchases of such vessels by Norwegians from Russians. Such purchases are always open to grave suspicion, and under colour of them numerous frauds upon Her Majesty's belligerent rights have been, and are still being committed.

---

I may add that I myself suggested to the Admiralty Proctor (who applied to me for advice) to adopt such a proceeding in some of these cases from an anxious desire to avoid arresting Norwegian ships, unless upon good grounds, on account of the Norwegian flag having hitherto been untainted by frauds of this kind.

Cannot exempt Norwegian ships.

No serious molestation appears to be complained of in any particular case, and I cannot advise any general exemption from investigation in favour of all Norwegian ships purchased (howsoever) from Russians,—no one paper, nor even the most complete set of papers, being in such cases absolutely conclusive of the legality of the transfer.

Baudin, the French Chargé d'Affaires, respecting an omission in the notice of this blockade which he wishes to be rectified, and to request that I would take these papers into my immediate consideration and draw up and transmit to your Lordship, with as little delay as possible, a proper notification of this blockade for insertion in the "Gazette," carrying into effect M. Baudin's wishes, provided I should see no legal objection thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Sends notification.

That I have accordingly prepared, and herewith transmit, a proper notification of this blockade for insertion in the "Gazette."

As to mentioning name of Emperor of French when no French ships take part.

With reference to the concluding paragraph of Admiral Dundas' despatch (No. 3 in Admiralty letter of 13th May) (in which the name of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French is introduced), and to the presumed absence of French ships from the blockading squadron at the time of the institution of the blockade, I would most respectfully suggest that the insertion into the notification of the name of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French by the side of that of Her Majesty (as desired by M. Baudin) can hardly be considered as "rectifying an omission" of the Admiral. I have, however, in accordance with your Lordship's intimation, inserted the name of His Imperial Majesty into the notification in a manner which I trust may be satisfactory to your Lordship and to M. S. Dundas, commanding Her Majesty's ships in the Baltic, and acting in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty and her ally His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French, announcing the establishment on and from the 28th April last of a strict blockade of the Russian ports and places therein mentioned by an effective force, which communication is to the following effect:—

"By the Honourable Richard Saunders Dundas, C.B., Rear-Admiral of the Blue, and Commander-in-chief of Her Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, on a particular service.

"It is hereby notified that, on the 28th day of April last, the entrance to the Gulf of Finland from Hango Head, in latitude 59° 46′ north, longitude 22° 58′ east, to the Dagerort Lighthouse in latitude 58° 55′ north, longitude 22° 12′ east; and that all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks from the Dagerort to the Filsand Lighthouse, in latitude 58° 25′ north, longitude 21° 50′ east, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of Her Majesty's ships; and it is hereby further notified that all measures authorized by the laws of nations and the respective Treaties between Her Majesty and the different neutral Powers will be adopted and executed on behalf of Her Majesty and her ally His Majesty the Emperor of the French with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

My Lord,

Baltic blockade.

Steps taken for publishing at Copenhagen.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me, for my information, and for any observations I may have to make thereon, two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen reporting the measures adopted by him to give publicity to the establishment of a blockade of certain Russian ports by Her Majesty's naval forces in the Baltic.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the blockade instituted by Captain Watson having, since the date of Mr. Buchanan's despatches, been notified in the "Gazette," and I presume also formally communicated in the ordinary manner by Her Majesty's Government to the Court of Denmark, no remarks from me appear to be particularly called for upon the subject of those despatches. Mr. Buchanan appears to have taken the best means at his command to announce the blockade in question to the Danish Government.

I trust that no doubt on the subject of the existing blockades now prevails at Copenhagen, either on the part of Her Majesty's Minister or Consuls, the Danish authorities or the commercial public. Should Mr. Buchanan find that any such doubts exist, or that there is any reason to suspect that either the existing blockades or any which may be hereafter instituted, or in effect ignored or evaded, I trust that he will immediately communicate with Admiral Dundas and with your Lordship thereupon.

Consuls must be prepared to prove knowledge of blockade in case of future necessity.

With reference to what occurred on this subject of blockade in Denmark last year, it may be hereafter of advantage to the Crown, if Her Majesty's Minister and Her Majesty's Consuls in Denmark were requested to be prepared to prove in case of necessity by reference to Danish newspapers and otherwise, on and from what date each blockade was announced from credible sources:—1st, as a matter of commercial intelligence; 2nd, officially, at Copenhagen and other principal Danish ports; so as to meet any denials or evasions on this subject which may possibly be again attempted by Danish claimants.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th April last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a telegraphic despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, reporting the sailing

1853-56

Muskets shipped from Flushing on board "Otto" for Para, but suspected to be for Russia.

of the Hamburgh brig "Otto" from Flushing, having on board 300 cases of Belgian muskets, said to be destined for Para, and a further despatch from Sir Ralph Abercromby stating that this shipment of arms was effected under suspicious circumstances, and suggesting, for reasons stated in that despatch, that British cruizers should be stationed off the coast of Holland, in order to secure the effectual repression of the trade in arms through that country.

As to principles which may be turned against ourselves hereafter.

Lord Wodehouse is pleased to state that although your Lordship fully concurs in the remarks contained in our report of the 27th of March,* as to establishing a principle that might be turned against ourselves, yet that, with reference to the importance of checking a trade likely to become considerable, and that will be of great benefit to the enemy, your Lordship thinks it expedient to submit the inclosed despatch to us for our advice as to the objections to which the recommendation of Sir R. Abercromby may be liable.

We are also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th May instant, stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to transmit to us a further despatch from Sir Ralph Abercromby, Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague, upon the same subject.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th May instant, stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Mr. Paget, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, upon this subject; and to request that we would take this despatch into consideration, together with the papers already before us, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, our opinion upon the matters to which they relate.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken into our consideration the several reports of Sir Ralph Abercromby, both with reference to the particular case of the brig "Otto," and the more general question of the course to be adopted by Her Majesty's Government.

"Otto" should be searched at sea, and captured if acting suspiciously.

With respect to the "Otto," we think the circumstances are such as to warrant the gravest suspicion as to the real destination of the vessel, and the true character of her cargo; and we recommend that instructions be given to a British cruizer to waylay and search the vessel as soon as she is beyond the limit of the Belgian waters; and should any of the cases be found to contain firelocks, not being "armes de luxe," or fowling-pieces properly so-called, and the vessel be found proceeding towards any port whence these arms might probably reach the enemy, instead of to South America, her alleged destination, to detain the vessel, and send her in to the nearest English port for examination, and, if necessary, condemnation.

General maxim.

Neutrals with contraband of war, when suspected to be for enemy, liable to capture.

On the general question, we beg to state that neutral vessels laden with contraband of war are liable to condemnation in cases where it may be properly inferred that such contraband of war is destined for the enemy's use. A neutral may lawfully carry contraband of war from one neutral port to another, unless there are circumstances which warrant a conclusion or suspicion that such contraband is really intended for the use of the enemy. Where the circumstances justify such a conclusion, the vessel may be captured, and would be condemned by the Court of Admiralty; but when grave suspicion only is warranted, the vessel may be properly detained, and sent in for further examination. In the present case, there is reason to apprehend that a clandestine traffic in contraband of war exists from the ports in the Netherlands to other neutral ports, whence such contraband is conveyed to the enemy; and that the intervention of the neutral consignee and the neutral destination are only colourable. We are, therefore, of opinion that it will be right to station allied cruizers off the ports of the Netherlands, and also the ports in the Baltic, from which there exist facilities of communication with Russia, with instructions to intercept and search strictly all vessels leaving and entering such ports respectively, so as to ascertain the nature and true destination of their cargoes, the state of their ships' papers, the course they had pursued, and other particulars. Vessels leaving Netherland ports, and bonâ fide bound to ports not suspicious (as South America), though laden with contraband of war, should not be molested, but if there should appear probable cause of suspicion on any point against any vessels so laden (such, for instance, as the existence of two sets of papers, or a pretended destination to Brazil coupled with a real voyage to Memel with contraband of war, or an entry in the manifest of rifles or revolvers under some other denomination, such as "armes de luxe"), such vessels should be captured and sent in for adjudication. In such cases they would (even if restored) probably have to pay the costs of the suit, or, at least, would recover no costs and damages; and this, together with the detention, would operate as a penalty, and tend to check the traffic which is complained of. It is, of course, not improbable that in some cases they might be restored with costs and damages, in which cases the actual captors should be indemnified by Her Majesty's Government.

Cruizers should be stationed off Netherlands, &c., to examine vessels.

Suspicious circumstances.

Indemnification of captors by Her Majesty's Government.

This system of searching neutrals might be rendered more or less rigorous as to the vessels of particular States, according to the ascertained results, and in proportion as those States may show a disposition or an indisposition to prevent their subjects from supplying the enemy with contraband of war.

My Lord,

Vessels under Wallachian and Moldavian flag suspected to belong to Russia.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 19th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter and its inclosures from the Admiralty, and to request that I would take the same into immediate consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion respecting the capture of the "St. Elena;" and also as to what instructions should be given to Rear-Admiral Grey respecting vessels under Moldavian and Wallachian colours.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

May properly be captured on high seas. If in Turkish jurisdiction, Turkish permission must be obtained. (Ionian vessels decided to be neutrals.)

That from Admiral Grey's statement of the facts connected with the "St. Elena," there seems to me to exist probable cause for suspecting her to be really Russian property, she has properly been ordered to be sent to Malta. If she was actually captured, not upon the high seas, but within Turkish jurisdiction, I presume that this was only done after communication with the Turkish authorities, and by their permission. This is a point which should be borne in mind in all similar cases, the more so as Ionian vessels are, by the recent decision of the Admiralty Court in the "Lencade," to be considered and treated as neutrals.

Admiral Grey may be instructed that vessels under Moldavian or Wallachian colours, which there may be probable cause for suspecting to be the actual property of persons who are domiciled in the enemy's dominions (whatever may be the actual origin or alleged national character of such persons) may be lawfully captured by Her Majesty's vessels on the high seas, and should when so captured be always sent to Malta for examination; but such vessels, whilst actually within Turkish jurisdiction, should not be searched, or captured without the previous permission of the Turkish authorities. I would venture to suggest that it may be desirable to come to some general understanding with the Turkish Government with reference to these vessels.

My Lord,

Lubeck vessels assuming Russian flag during Danish war, re-transferred at its conclusion.

Case of the "Phœnix."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the inclosed despatch from Colonel Hodges, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Hamburgh, inclosing a copy of a list which he has received from Mr. Blackwell, the British Vice-Consul at Lubeck, of Lubeck vessels that sailed under the Russian flag during the Danish and Schleswig-Holstein war, and re-assumed the Lubeck flag on peace being re-established, and which, with reference to the case of the "Phœnix," lately seized in the port of London, Mr. Blackwell considers liable to seizure and the payment of costs; and Mr. Hammond is pleased to request that I would take this matter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1853-56

Not liable to capture for having once sailed under Russian flag.

That the vessels in question will not, in my opinion, be liable to seizure or capture merely by reason of their having sailed under the Russian flag during the Danish and Schleswig war. I am informed by the Admiralty Proctor that the "Phœnix" had on board papers showing her to have been under the Russian flag in 1851, and had no papers showing that she had ever been legally re-transferred, or that she was not Russian at the time of seizure.

Vigilance necessary.

These and other papers were subsequently produced by her owners; the Admiralty Advocate was satisfied that she was not Russian, and the vessel was restored under his advice, without having been proceeded against, upon the owners voluntarily consenting (out of Court) to pay the costs. Considering the numerous frauds which have been, and are still being committed in this respect, the necessity of vigilant attention to the particular circumstances of each case, and the very small number of cases in which neutrals have been molested without probable cause during the present war, I cannot advise your Lordship to issue any special instructions as to the vessels in question. Mr. Consul Blackwell's opinion, that "there is no doubt of the above-mentioned vessels being bonâ fide Lubeck property" (though doubtless most honestly given) ought not, in my opinion, to protect them from all investigation; and on the other hand, the fact that they once sailed under the Russian flag and papers will not, unless accompanied by the absence of proper papers, or by other suspicious circumstances, necessarily cause their seizure or capture.

It may be proper to transmit copies of Mr. Consul Blackwell's despatch to the Queen's Proctor, and to the Admiralty Proctor, for their guidance.

Transit of arms for Russia through Hanover.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th May last, stating that with reference to my reports of the 28th February and 16th April last,* respecting the transit of arms destined for Russia through Hanover, he was directed to transmit to me a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Hanover upon this subject; and Lord Wodehouse states that he is to inquire whether, in my opinion, Her Majesty's Government can send any additional instructions thereupon to Mr. Bligh.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Agent proceeded against discharged for want of proof.

May call upon Hanoverian Government to take steps to prevent transit of such arms.

That it now appears that Westedt (the Agent concerned in receiving and forwarding these revolvers), having been proceeded against by the Hanoverian authorities for violating the Hanoverian neutrality laws, has been discharged for want of proof. It is not stated that any other measures are contemplated to prevent these revolvers from being forwarded. I can only suggest that Mr. Bligh may, if it seems proper to your Lordship, be instructed to the following effect, viz., to urge upon the Hanoverian Government the duty and expediency of preventing these particular arms, and also all similar consignments which may be ultimately intended for Russian use, from entering, passing through, or leaving the Hanoverian dominions.

That it is not for Her Majesty's Government to point out to the Hanoverian Government the best means of effecting this object, but that it cannot be satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government to be informed that in this or that particular case proof is wanting or proceedings have failed, whilst it is notorious that the traffic continues. That Her Majesty's Government, having made unexampled concessions and changes in the maritime law and policy of Great Britain for the express purpose of protecting and favouring neutral interests, is entitled to expect that neutral Powers will show their sense of such conduct by adopting measures in a corresponding spirit, even by enacting special laws if necessary which will practically and effectually operate to prevent these concessions being grossly abused in practice by supplying Russia with articles contraband of war. That in the event of this traffic continuing, Her Majesty's Government may find itself under the disagreeable necessity of taking such steps as may prove extremely prejudicial to Hanoverian commercial interests.

My Lord,

Capture of the "Otto and Olaff" coming out of Riga.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 1st June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Wehner protesting against the capture by Her Majesty's cruizers in the Baltic of the "Otto and Olaff" on the passage of that vessel from Riga to Copenhagen, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the reply to be returned to Mr. Wehner. In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

M. Wehner's protest against.

That the Queen's Proctor has received no information relating to the case of the ship "Otto and Olaff," and that (judging merely from the contents of M. Wehner's letter to your Lordship) I cannot recommend your Lordship to accede to that gentleman's demand, or to interfere at all in the matter.

Cargo unloaded for crossing the bar.

Captured after institution of blockade.

I am not aware whether M. Wehner is a British subject, or, if not, of what State he is a subject or citizen. He appears to be acting in this matter merely as the agent of Messrs. Suse and Co., of Hamburgh, the asserted charterers of this Danish ship. He does not state that they have any interest in the ship, nor does it appear whether or not he is personally interested in either the ship or cargo to any and what amount. The ship appears to have left Riga with cargo after the 5th of May last, having, as alleged, previously discharged and reladen her cargo in order to enable her to pass the bar. Neither the date of this unlading, of this relading, nor that of her capture is given. These dates are probably withheld for reasons best known to M. Wehner. Inasmuch, however, as the Gulf of Riga was blockaded on and from the 19th April last, and the vessel was captured coming out of that port with cargo on or after the 5th of May, her capture appears to be, at all events, primâ facie justifiable.

Cannot accede to demand. Would prejudice case before Prize Court, on question of costs, &c.

I need scarcely point out that whilst M. Wehner adopts a ridiculously peremptory tone in his letter to your Lordship, he plainly intimates his intention to apply to the Prize Court for costs and damages against the captors. This alone would appear to me a sufficient reason for your Lordship's declining at present to interfere, for if the ship and cargo should be at once restored without conditions, this might be considered by the Court as amounting to an admission that the capture was Blockade of White Sea. Whether notice of September 1854 is still in force.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th May ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Mr. Paget, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon the question raised in that despatch, whether the blockade of the White Sea, which was notified in the "London Gazette" of the 29th of September last, is to be considered as still remaining in force.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken the despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, although the general principle of international law is in favour of the opinion expressed by Mr. Paget, I consider that this principle cannot be safely or strictly applied in practice to the particular case of Archangel under existing circumstances.

Prize Court might consider blockade raised.

The fact that the blockading force of the allies had left their station off that port long ago, and that the port was not at present blockaded, might not improbably be considered by a Prize Court as being either notorious, or, at least, open to so much doubt as to save a neutral from condemnation for merely sailing on a voyage thereto, and to require either a fresh notification, or an actual warning, in order to condemn such neutral.

As, however, Mr. Paget has correctly stated the general principle, and as Mr. Van Hall, in admitting its present application to Archangel, has acted advisedly and with full knowledge of the existing facts, it will be for your Lordship to consider whether any, or what further communication to the Netherlands Government will be necessary or advisable.

It is hereby further notified that this notification is not in any manner, or for any purpose whatever, to be considered as superceding, impairing, or altering the notification relating to the said blockade of the Gulf of Finland heretofore published in the Supplement to the "London Gazette" of the 18th May last, but that it is issued only for the further and fuller information of all persons interested therein.

My Lord,

Proposed communication to Danish Government respecting treatment of vessels coming out of blockaded ports.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter which, in pursuance of what passed at the interview with the First Lord of the Admiralty a short time ago, at which Mr. Hammond and myself were present, and which was afterwards recorded in a letter from the Admiralty sent herewith, your Lordship addressed to the French Chargé d'Affaires on the subject of the communication which Her Majesty's Government proposed to make to the Danish Minister in reply to his observations on the reserve contained in the letter addressed to him on the 11th April, touching the manner in which vessels coming out of blockaded ports might be dealt with by Her Majesty's cruizers. Mr. Hammond also incloses the reply, which your Lordship has just received from the French Ambassador on this subject, stating the objections entertained by his Government to the employment of the precise terms which your Lordship proposed to employ, and suggesting a modification in your expressions; and requests that I would take the observations contained in M. Persigny's letter into consideration, together with the former papers relating to this case, which are inclosed, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Rejects French amendments.

That I cannot recommend any alteration as to the point in question being made to the effect or in the sense which M. de Persigny appears to suggest in his note to your Lordship of the 1st June.

In the letter from the Secretary to the Admiralty to Mr. Hammond (12th May),

1853-56

Capture of all vessels from blockaded ports is principle of international law, not of British prize law.

and your Lordship's letter to Mr. Baudin in accordance therewith, the principle of international law which is applicable to the question under consideration is correctly stated. Her Majesty's Officers have, in my opinion, the absolute legal right by the law and usage of nations to capture and send in for adjudication every laden vessel coming out of a blockaded port after the establishment of the blockade. It is, however, clearly explained in the letter and note in question that this strict legal right will not be exercised without exception, but that vessels against which there is any reasonable suspicion will be captured, and that Her Majesty's officers will exercise a reasonable discretion in each case. Count Persigny admits that both Governments are agreed upon the effect of this explanation. His Excellency, however, as I understand his note, seems desirous that the legal right should be stated by your Lordship as one exclusively and peculiarly of English prize law, and not as an undoubted belligerent right by international law.

I cannot advise your Lordship to accede to any such qualification or limitation being introduced into any formal or official document whatever, and I therefore respectfully suggest to your Lordship the expediency of adhering to the terms of your Lordship's note to M. Baudin of May 23.

That I am informed by the Queen's Proctor that the "Dania," with others captured coming out of Riga after the blockade under similar circumstances, arrived in England a few days ago; that proceedings were immediately commenced against her by directions from the Admiralty; that the witnesses are actually under examination; and that the depositions and ship's papers will be immediately laid before me. As soon as I have an opportunity of seeing these documents I shall be in a position to determine upon the course which the Crown should adopt in this particular case as well as in others of the same class. I would therefore venture to submit that General Oxholm may be informed of these circumstances, and may be assured that the utmost expedition shall be used in determining the course to be adopted as to the "Dania."

* No. 333.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the objections to the publication of the proposed notification which are pointed out in Count Walewski's Memorandum are by no means without foundation, and they had suggested themselves to me before I prepared the additional notification.

Reasons why necessary.

I considered, however, and I still consider, that Admiral Dundas' distinct statement in his letter to the Admiralty of the 22nd May last (No. 109), "that it cannot be truly stated that all the ports and places in the Gulf of Finland eastward of Dagerort and of Hango Head were strictly blockaded on the 28th April, except in so far as the trade of those ports may be affected by a blockade of the entrance of the Gulf of Finland, which was duly established on that date," when taken in connection with the Admiral's subsequent letter of the 28th May, No. 121, in which he states that "being now in a position in which the port of Cronstadt can be effectually blockaded, and as Her Majesty's ships will be continually cruizing in various parts of the Gulf of Finland, I am of opinion that the period has now arrived at which all the ports, creeks, and inlets within the Gulf may be declared to be in a state of blockade; and I submit that the usual notice may be issued to that effect, and to be fixed for yesterday's date," renders the publication of an additional notification the most advisable course.

Legal effect on ports in a gulf of blockade of the entrance to the gulf.

Unless this step is taken, it is to be apprehended that in the event of strict legal proof being required by a Prize Court from the Admiral, both of the fact and of the date of the commencement of the blockade of the ports in the Gulf of Finland (which was actually required from and furnished by Admiral Napier last year), the Admiral must admit that all the ports in the Gulf were not actually blockaded on and from the date when the entrance to the Gulf was blockaded and notified; and it might (in the absence of any subsequent notification) be held by the Prize Court that there never had been any legal or valid notification of any blockade of those ports. The legal effect upon ports within a gulf of a blockade confined to the entrance of the gulf is at this moment the subject of appeal.

The proposed "further notification" will tend to render the blockade of all the ports in the Gulf of Finland legal and notorious, at all events from the 27th May.

With respect to the observation in the Memorandum that "if the first notification should give rise to doubts, it is the duty of the Prize Courts, and not of the Government, to solve them," I can only say that British Prize Courts consider it to be the peculiar duty of a belligerent Government to obviate all doubt as to the date and particulars of a blockade instituted by it; and I therefore submit that (although it is impossible to adopt a course wholly free from difficulty), all things considered, the publication of such additional notification will be the most advisable course for Her Majesty to adopt, under the peculiar circumstances of the case.

My Lord,

Danish vessels captured.

Cargoes unloaded to cross a bar, and reloaded.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th June instant, stating that, with reference to my Reports of the 4th and 12th instant,* respecting Danish vessels captured by Her Majesty's cruizers on the ground that they had loaded cargo after the establishment of a blockade (although they had merely unloaded, and reloaded to enable them to cross a bar), he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Danish Minister at this Court relative to the seizure of the "Otto and Olaf," for any observations I may have to make thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

M. Wehner's "Otto and Olaff."

That in this case (if I rightly remember) M. Wehner, in his letter to your Lordship of the 29th May, demanded the restitution of his vessel as a matter of right, and also stated his intention of instituting legal proceedings against the captors for costs and damages. General Oxholm appears in his note of the 8th June to ask for her restoration as a matter of favour under the special circumstances of the case, in order to save the expense of proceeding in the Admiralty Court. M. Wehner, however,

---

* Nos. 331 and 335.

Danish Minister's request for her release.

will probably institute such proceedings in any event. I may observe that M. Wehner's interest appears to be confined to the cargo, which he claims on behalf of Susé and Co. of Hamburgh; whilst General Oxholm's request is confined to the ship.

Is a Russian transferred ship.

I have perused the ship's papers, and depositions in the case, and if the only point were the suggested breach of blockade, I am of opinion that the explanation given by General Oxholm, which is supported by the master's deposition, as to the peculiar circumstances under which her cargo was unladen and reladen, might be considered sufficient to justify the Crown in directing the ship and cargo to be at once restored, either upon payment of costs, or upon the question of costs being left to the decision of the Court; such restoration being asked for, and granted as a matter of favour, and not of right. It appears, however, by the ship's papers that the "Otto and Olaf" was built in Russia, and named the "Niord," and that she was owned by Russians until the 30th of May 1854, when she appears to have been bought whilst lying at Copenhagen by her present Danish owners, and her name was then changed to the "Otto and Olaf." It is to be observed that this purchase was made flagrante bello, when all the parties concerned must have been well aware of the existence of the war. Had she been captured by a French cruizer she would have been at once condemned. The present master and crew were only engaged at a later period, and are therefore unable to give any information about the purchase and change of flag.

Cargo may be restored but not ship.

Under these circumstances, and bearing in mind the numerous recent cases of colourable sales of Russian ships to Danes, and also M. Wehner's avowed intention of claiming costs and damages against the captor, I cannot advise your Lordship to comply with General Oxholm's request as to this ship. She ought in my opinion to be left to be dealt with as the Court may direct.

I shall advise the Queen's Proctor to offer forthwith to restore the cargo either on payment of costs, or on leaving that question to the Court, as may be arranged with the claimants of the cargo.

Foreign Office, June 29, 1855.

Notification.

IT is hereby notified that the Right Honourable the Earl of Clarendon, K.G., Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty an official communication from Rear Admirals Penaud and Dundas, commanding the allied naval forces in the Baltic, and acting in the name and on behalf of Her Majesty and of her ally, His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French, announcing that on the 15th June instant all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks on the coast of Finland, from Nystad, in latitude 60° 46′ north, longitude 21° 20′ east of Greenwich, to Hango Head, in latitude 59° 46′ north, longitude 22° 55′ east of Greenwich, including especially the port of Abo, and including likewise all the islands and islets fronting the said coast, and all channels and passages leading amongst the said islands towards the said coast, that is to say, more especially the channels leading to and amongst the islands between Nystad, as aforesaid, and the Island of Landto, in latitude 60° 23′ north, longitude 20° 47′ east of Greenwich, and the several channels respectively leading between, and to the eastward of, the Islands of Landto, Enklinge, Kumblinge, Seglinge, and the Kokar Rocks, in latitude 59° 52′ north, longitude 21° east of Greenwich, and thence all channels leading to the coast of Finland between the Kokar Rocks and the Outo lighthouse, and between Outo and Hango Head, as aforesaid, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of the allied fleets; and it is hereby further notified that all measures authorized by the laws of nations and the respective Treaties between their Majesties and the different neutral Powers, will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockade.

Seizure of Austrian vessel "Nina" at Ipswich.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Austrian Minister at this Court, relative to the seizure of the Austrian vessel "Nina" by the Custom-house authorities at Ipswich, also inclosing a letter from the Treasury on the same subject, and requesting that I would report upon the answer which should be returned to Count Colloredo.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Formerly Russian, owned and commanded as at present.

Suspicious.

That I have inquired of the Admiralty Proctor into the circumstances and proceedings connected with this vessel. He informs me that she has been seized by the authority of the Customs, and proceeded against under his advice and that of the Admiralty Advocate upon what appears to me to be sufficient grounds. She appears to have been at Gloucester in April, 1853, under Russian colours, both her owner and master being then apparently the same persons as at present. There was considerable difficulty and delay in obtaining the delivery of her papers from the master, and he has up to the 23rd June refused to be examined as a witness. It is somewhat singular that Count Colloredo, whilst stating that she was purchased at Odessa by her present owner in September, 1853, should omit to state the date or place at which she first actually assumed the Austrian flag.

Must leave to decision of Prize Court.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that Count Colloredo should be informed, without any allusion to these facts, that your Lordship must decline to interfere with the legal proceedings now pending against the "Nina," which must be left to the decision of the Prize Court.

I have, &c.

My Lord,

Time allowed by Russian Government to British vessels to clear out after outbreak of war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of yesterday's date, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Ellis, requesting to be furnished with official documents or information to produce in the Court of Common Pleas on Monday next, respecting the time allowed by the Russian Government to British vessels to load and clear out of Russian ports after the breaking out of the present war; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and inform your Lordship what answer it would be right and proper to return to Mr. Ellis.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1853-56

Mr. Ellis's inquiry.

That I am not aware that your Lordship has any sufficient means of giving Mr. Ellis either the document or the evidence which he desires. However this may be, he has not, in my opinion, established any sufficient case for requiring your Lordship to deviate in his favour from what I conceive to be the safe and ordinary practice in such matters, viz., not to communicate information or copies of official documents from the Foreign Office to any applicants privately, or except in obedience to a subpœna or other writ or order of some competent court. I am therefore of opinion that Mr. Ellis should be informed that his request cannot be complied with.

Should decline to answer.

I observe that Mr. Ellis omits to give any particulars of the nature or object of the suit in question, the use which he means to make of the information which he seeks, or the names or occupations of his clients. The application is made at a very late period of the proceedings, and he does not give any reference or even state that he is acting under the advice of counsel in making any such application.

I beg to refer to my Report upon Mr. Condell's application, dated the 13th January, 1854.*

My Lord,

Danish vessel "Dania."

WITH reference to my report of the 12th June instant,† as to General Oxholm's application as to the case of the Danish vessel "Dania," I have now the honour to report—

Restored with cargo. Costs pending.

That the "Dania," together with her cargo, has been, under my advice, restored, but that, inasmuch as the claimants insist upon and are proceeding for costs and damages against the captor, this question still remains to be decided by the court.

I may, perhaps, be permitted to suggest the possibility of causing inquiry to be made of the foreign Ministers who in so many cases apply to your Lordship for the immediate release of captured vessels under special circumstances, in order to save expense to the owners, whether they are prepared, in case of their request being granted, to undertake that no claim for costs or damages shall be made in the Prize Court against the captors.

Costs should not be sued for in cases of restoration.

As to suggesting to Foreign Ministers who claim release of vessels.

It does not appear to me to be a very consistent or convenient course for a foreign Minister to apply to Her Majesty's Government to restore a vessel without further proceedings, in order to save expense to the owner, whilst the owner is at the same time instituting or carrying on proceedings for costs and damages against the captor, and is thus voluntarily either causing or increasing the very expense of which his Minister is complaining. I observe that in these cases the claimants appear to have no desire to compromise the matter, or to settle it upon any terms, or to save the expense of legal proceedings, but rather the contrary; and the interests of the individual captors are, as a general principle, I conceive, entitled to consideration and legal protection on the part of the Crown. At all events it does not seem to me that foreign Ministers have a just right to complain of the institution of legal proceedings in those cases in which foreigners are themselves voluntarily parties by praying for costs and damages after and notwithstanding restitution.

I have, &c.

My Lord,

M. Wienholt's saltpetre, exported to Portugal and re-exported to Hamburgh; captured by French cruizer.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th June last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying correspondence as noted in the margin of his letter, respecting a quantity of saltpetre in which M. Wienholt is interested, and which was originally exported from this country to Portugal, and subsequently captured on its voyage from the Tagus to Hamburgh, and which has been condemned in the French Prize Court; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon M. Wienholt's application for the interference of Her Majesty's Government to prevent the saltpetre from being confiscated.

Protest.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 27th June, stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to transmit to me some further communications (as noted in the margin of his letter) from Messrs. Wienholt, protesting against the confiscation by the French Prize Court of the saltpetre belonging to their firm, which was captured by a French war steamer on board the Hanoverian vessel "Vrou Howina," and to request that I would take the papers now inclosed into consideration, together with the correspondence already in my possession, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon Messrs. Wienholt's application for the interference of Her Majesty's Government in their behalf, and also as to the answer which should be returned to their letters.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere.

That I am of opinion that M. Wienholt's application for the interference of Her Majesty's Government on his own behalf and on that of his firm, should not be acceded to by your Lordship, and that an answer may be returned to his letters to that effect.

I presume that your Lordship is satisfied that Mr. Frederick Wienholt and his partners are British subjects, if not, they should perhaps be referred to the Government of their own country.

Interference with Prize Court of an ally only allowable in very exceptional cases.

As I do not consider it advisable at present, that Mr. Wienholt should be informed of the reasons of your Lordship's decision, I forbear to trouble your Lordship with remarks either upon the judgment of the French Conseil des Prises, or on the arguments of Mr. Wienholt and his advocate. Such remarks could not be usefully made without seeing all the papers and depositions in the case, as well as the arguments for the captors before the Conseil des Prises. I may, however, observe for your Lordship's guidance, that it is only in very exceptional cases that your Lordship should interpose in favour of British subjects whose goods have been condemned in a French Prize Court, especially when they have been so condemned for trading with the enemy in saltpetre. Even if the decision of the Conseil des Prises should not appear altogether to be sound or satisfactory (as to which I do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion), yet, the general circumstances of the case, more especially all that passed at Oporto, and the conduct of Mr. Scholz (whom Mr. Wienholt admits to have been his agent there), appear to me to be so very suspicious, if not absolutely fraudulent (which they are considered to be by Mr. Consul Smith in No. 77), as to render it unadvisable that your Lordship should address any remonstrance to the French Government as to this case.

My Lord,

Netherlands vessels "Catharine" and "Sjouke Alida" detained in the Black Sea by Her Majesty's cruizers.

Compensation to owners.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 22nd June last, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 31st March last,* respecting the compensation to be awarded to the owners of the Netherland vessels the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," in consequence of the detention of those vessels by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Netherlands Minister at this Court stating the amount of the compensation to which the owners of the vessels in question lay claim; and to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's note into consideration, together with the former papers therewith sent, and that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the amount which should be allowed to the claimants.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I observe that Baron Bentinck incloses to your Lordship a letter from the parties interested in these vessels, Messrs. Kuyper, Vaudane, and Smeer, claiming

2,251*l.* in all (as I understand it) as a proper amount of compensation, and his Excellency recommends this demand to the favourable consideration of your Lordship in general terms, but his Excellency does not, as I understand his note, distinctly adopt that demand or vouch for its correctness or reasonableness, nor does he, I apprehend, officially demand or allude to that sum, or any other sum, as being a proper and reasonable amount of compensation, in the opinion of the Netherland Government. This appears to me a somewhat inconvenient mode of proceeding; and I would venture to suggest, that if the Netherland Government is to be considered as either making or adopting this sum, it should form and express its own opinion of the reasonableness of the particular sum demanded on account of each vessel, and should be prepared to supply particulars and vouchers in support of each item, and that it should not confine itself to recommending to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government such a vague demand as that of Messrs. Kuyper and Co., in which no particulars or vouchers are given, and which is not even in the form usual amongst merchants.

Netherlands Government should demand fixed sum, supported by vouchers.

Subject to these observations, I can only say that the particulars of the demand contained in the letter of Messrs. Kuyper, Vaudane, and Smeer are so entirely wanting in details, that it is impracticable to enter upon any useful discussion thereof.

I can only remark generally that the total amount claimed seems at first sight extravagant, and that no particulars are given as to the composition and value of either of the cargoes or of their depreciation (if any) by the detention, nor in the actual loss attempted to be distinguished from the contingent, or consequential damage. Above all no single document by way of voucher is even alluded to.

If Messrs. Kuyper and Co. were making a similar demand upon underwriters, or any other mercantile firm, they would not receive anything without furnishing a very different sort of an account, together with vouchers for each item.

Cannot consider claim without proper vouchers and particulars.

Until therefore the necessary further particulars and vouchers for the sum claimed (if indeed such sum is seriously demanded, and relied on by the Netherland Government) are forthcoming, I cannot attempt to offer any opinion as to the amount which should be allowed to the claimants.

I can only suggest the necessity of some distinct understanding being arrived at, as to whether Her Majesty's Government is to deal with the Netherland Government directly and exclusively in this matter, or whether it is to deal with the claimants themselves. It will be for your Lordship to consider whether Baron Bentinck might not be requested to state distinctly whether the Netherland Government adopts Messrs. Kuyper and Co.'s demand and relies upon its correctness; and if it does so, that Her Majesty's Government may be furnished with a regular mercantile account in each of the two cases, with items, and vouchers, as usual in all cases of maritime loss or damage (distinguishing actual loss incurred from contingent, or consequential or estimated loss), in order to enable Her Majesty's Government to form some opinion as to the reasonableness of the demand made in each case and under each head.

My Lord,

As to restoring Danish prize "Otto and Olaf."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June last stating that, with reference to my report of the 21st June,* upon the case of the "Otto and Olaf," he was directed to transmit to me a further note from the Danish Minister at this Court; and in requesting my opinion thereupon he was pleased to add that General Oxholm has expressed his confident hope that the vessel will be restored.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I can only refer to and adhere to my previous reports upon this case of the 4th and 21st June last.

Number of Russian vessels under Danish flag.

Peculiar vigilance appears to me to be requisite with respect to Danish vessels, inasmuch as nearly half the vessels seized since the commencement of the war on suspicion of being Russian have been seized under the Danish flag, and a pretended purchase has been almost invariably insisted upon. Many of these frauds have been detected and exposed, but neither the Danish Government nor the Danish authorities or merchants appear to me to have taken any sufficient measures to prevent these abuses of the Danish flag, but rather the contrary; and I own that I cannot see any sufficient reason for acceding to General Oxholm's application or for restoring this particular vessel. It will, however, be competent for the Crown to adopt this course if your Lordship should think it advisable. In this event, I submit that the payment of the captor's costs may fairly be required as a condition precedent.

Danish Government take no step to prevent abuse of flag.

Crown has power to restore, if it pleases.

As to costs.

My Lord,

Austrian vessel "Nina" seized at Ipswich on suspicion of being Russian.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th July instant stating that with reference to my report of the 28th ultimo,* on the case of the Austrian vessel "Nina" seized by the Custom-house authorities at Ipswich, he was directed to transmit to me two further notes on this subject which have been received from the Austrian Minister at this Court; and to request that I would inform your Lordship at my earliest convenience whether there is anything in those notes to cause an alteration in the opinion already given in my letter of the 28th ultimo.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the notes into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Can't alter opinion on evidence produced.

That the "Nina" having been seized by the Customs, and proceeded against upon what appeared to the Admiralty Advocate to be sufficient grounds, I can not say that there is sufficient in the notes in question to cause any material alteration in the opinion which I have already given in my report of the 28th ultimo. I may observe (for your Lordship's guidance) that although Count Colloredo states, under date of the 5th of July, that the asserted owner (Gherardovitch) was then in this country, yet that no claim had been made in the Admiralty Court by him or on his behalf up to the 7th July, and that until the ship's papers have been translated, and the depositions of the master and crew taken, it is impossible to form any opinion as to the ultimate result of the case. Two documents only are enclosed or alluded to by Count Colloredo, (1.) the certificate of the owner having been born in the Austrian dominions, (2.) the memorandum (in Italian) of the sale and purchase of the vessel at Odessa in August 1853; this is not executed by Gherardovitch, who whould seem to have then been domiciled at Odessa, nor does it appear under what flag the vessel then sailed, nor when she changed her flag, or he changed his domicile. It is obvious that neither of these documents is sufficient in itself to justify your Lordship in recommending the restitution of the "Nina."

That I cannot advise your Lordship to comply with Baron Hochschild's request. I may remark, for your Lordship's guidance, that this vessel appears to have been built in Russia, her construction being proceeded with and completed "flagrante bello," and she is alleged to have left Libau after the blockade of that port was raised last year, and after and notwithstanding an unsuccessful application had been made to Her Majesty's Government in her favour. Messrs. Sorensen and Co., the owner's agents at Libau, have been concerned in a number of very suspicious transfers of Russian ships to neutrals, which are still before the Prize Court, and Mr. Gamper, the builder of the "Gefion," at Libau, has been concerned in at least one of such transctions, as in connection with Sorensen and Co.

Blockade of the White Sea.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, inclosing a notice of the blockade of Russian ports, havens, and creeks in the White Sea; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and draw up and transmit to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, a proper notification of the said blockade for insertion in the "Gazette," provided I see no objection thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Notification.

That I have accordingly prepared and herewith transmit a notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

Name of Emperor of French inserted.

I have inserted therein the name of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French without being distinctly instructed so to do, in accordance with what has been done in similar cases which have already occurred. If this be not approved of in this particular case, it will be only necessary to omit the words underscored in the notification.

I do not observe that in any of the documents transmitted to me Captain Hamilton Baillie expressly states that he had on the 11th June placed his force so as to close all the ports and places mentioned in the notification, and had then actually instituted a blockade thereof, but this is so clearly to be inferred from the tenor of his despatches that I presume the Admiralty have no doubt of it, and I have assumed it to be the fact.

WITH reference to my former reports* upon the representations of General Oxholm on the matter of the Danish vessel "Otto and Olaf," captured by one of Her Majesty's ships when coming out of Riga, I beg respectfully to invite your Lordship's attention to the Report of the Judgment of the Prize Court in that case in the "Times" of July 13th (this day).

I beg also to inclose a copy of the printed papers in the case, and to request that this copy, together with a copy of the "Times" containing the Judgment, may be transmitted to Her Majesty's Consul at Copenhagen, and that his attention may be directed to the dates of the "Latin Pass," p. 5, No. 1 (4th May), and of the Certificate, p. 6, No. 2 (9th June). To the very different names and descriptions of the owners in the different documents. "Claim," p. 27. "Latin Pass and Certificate," pp. 5, 6. "Certificate of Measurement, p. 6, No. 3. Wants information as to frequent irregularities in ships' papers of Danish vessels.

To the fact that the Latin Pass had never been renewed, as required by the Danish Law, although the ship had been thrice at least in a Danish port after it was granted (see Log Book, p. 4, No. 21), and that Her Majesty's Consul may be requested to obtain the best information, and legal advice if necessary as to these points; more particularly to the 1st and 2nd points; and that he may be informed that these and similar irregularities often occur in Danish ships' papers of which various excuses and explanations are offered by claimants, and that it would be desirable if the Queen's Proctor could be furnished with information, for the guidance of the Crown, as to how far such irregularities are or are not considered as of legal importance in Denmark, and what precautions are taken to secure the real names and descriptions of owners being found on the face of the ship's papers; and also to ensure the correct dating of Latin Passes, and their renewal after each voyage, with a view, not merely to the case of the "Otto and Olaf," but to other Danish cases.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding I beg to repeat that I am only desirous of obtaining the necessary information from independent persons, and that I do not wish any communication on the subject to be addressed to the Danish authorities.

Admiralty Court, Thursday, July 12.

(Before Dr. Lushington.)

The "Otto and Olaf."—Claim for Restitution of Ship, and for Costs and Damages on Detention of Cargo.

"Otto and Olaf."

Breach of blockade.

THIS ship, under Danish colours, took on board a cargo of coals at Copenhagen, and sailed to the 2nd of January last, bound for Riga, where, having discharged it, she was again loaded with wheat and rye, and attempted to prosecute her voyage, but was compelled, in consequence of the ice, to put into Bolderaa. On leaving she was unable to cross the bar, in consequence of there not being sufficient depth of water; a part of the cargo was therefore put into lighters, and subsequently reshipped. On the 8th of May she was captured by Her Majesty's ships "Arthur" and "Geyser," off Riga, for a breach of blockade, in loading cargo after notification of the blockade, but on the 15th of that month was released. On the evening of the same day she was again seized by the same vessels, and sent to England as prize. The cargo was restored, but a claim was now made for costs and damages incurred by its detention, and another claim was made for restitution of the ship with costs and damages.

The Queen's Advocate, on behalf of the captors, said that the port was blockaded on the 19th April, the vessel was first captured on the 8th May, and, according to the principles laid down in the case of the "Soglasie," the Court must call for further proof. The master in answer to interrogatories, deposed that he had not attempted to leave any port under blockade; that when at Riga he saw in a Hamburg paper—he thought in April—a Proclamation that all ships would be allowed to go out which had entered Russian ports after the blockade was raised last year, and had taken on board their cargoes before the blockade was imposed this year; and that he did not receive any other instructions from any one respecting any blockade which then was or thereafter might be established. The mate also deposed that he did not receive any instructions whatever. Riga was the most difficult place to affect with a knowledge of a blockade, and he did not think that the Court could believe that the master and mate were answering honestly. This vessel, however, instead of keeping her cargo on board, took part of it out and reloaded it. It was not said that the blockade had not been broken, because the cargo had been taken on board before it was imposed, but they went beyond it, and said they never heard of the blockade at all. When parties claimed costs and damages they must come with clean hands. The general principles of law applicable to these cases were laid down by Chancellor Kent in his "Commentaries," vol. 1, p. 148; in the Arthur Edward's Ad. R. 203; and the "Vrouw Judith," 1 C. Rob., 153. It was all very well to say that vessels were only taking on board from lighters a part of the cargo which they had before put into them; but how were captors to know the nature of that pecular loading from lighters which in some cases they had actually seen to be going on, the lighters having run away when they saw the blockading vessels? It was preposterous to ask for costs and damages on the cargo. Besides, the cargo must be guided by the fate of the ship. With regard to the ship, it was extremely difficult to know who were the owners. The names of the persons now claiming her did not agree with those contained in the ship's papers. The Latin Pass was not in compliance with the conditions imposed by the Danish Government. There had been a change of ownership, and the vessel had made three trips to Copenhagen without the pass being renewed. The ship had remained Russian property down to the 5th of May, long after the war was known to exist.

Dr. Deane followed on the same side, and contended that if the vessel had been properly sent to this country it would be impossible to grant the expenses consequent on the detention of the cargo. The sale of the ship from Russians to Danes had taken place when she was at Copenhagen, under a power of attorney, but none of the correspondence between the sellers and purchasers had been produced. The name of one of the persons claiming the ship did not appear anywhere in the papers.

Dr. Addams, on behalf of the claimants, submitted that this was a case for immediate restitution, with costs and damages.

The Court wished to known if there was any case in which costs and damages had been given on the restoration of a vessel captured on coming out of a blockaded port.

Dr. Addams was not aware of any instance in which a ship had been captured on such flimsy grounds as the "Otto and Olaf." He would not argue the question of costs and damages, but would adhere to what he had said in the "Ostsee." Where a cargo had been detained and sent in for adjudication without the slightest ground for it, the owners were entitled to costs and damages. With respect to the ship, he would not complain of the law which enabled a captor to seize her, send her home for adjudication, and then avail himself of whatever appeared in the ship's papers which would inure to her comdemnation, even though he had procured the information by his own unjust act. This vessel, it had been said, was purchased of Russian owners, flagrante bello, but he presumed that was legal. There had been two bills of sale, one only of which was before the Court, but the other had been placed in the hands of the Queen's Proctor, which accounted for the variation in the names. What was there to raise a presumption against the integrity of the sale? The single circumstance was that the bill of sale was dated after the Latin Pass, but he believed that a number of passes were issued on a given day, and were afterwards granted to persons applying for them without any indorsement as to the actual date when they were given out. The ship had been sent in for adjudication without any ground for it.

Dr. Twiss also appeared for the claimants, and said that there was a certificate which formed part and parcel of the ship's papers, which fixed the date when the pass was given, and by which all difficulty as to the period of the sale was removed. The Danish authorities were the best judges as to whether or not their municipal law had been complied with. The certificate was dated the 9th of June, and the bill of sale the 30th of May. A vessel coming out of a blockaded port was liable to be overhauled, but if it turned out that the cargo was taken on board before the blockade was established, and she was prevented from sailing simply by reason of the ice, there was no probable cause for detaining her and sending her to this country for inquiry or adjudication. There could not be a doubt that this vessel was neutral property, and that she had not committed a breach of blockade.

The Queen's Advocate and Dr. Deane having been heard in reply,

Judgment.

The learned Judge said there were two questions to be disposed of—one relating to the cargo, the other to the ship. Assuming the vessel to have been duly transferred to Danish subjects, they determined to resort to an adventure. Having entered a Russian port after the former blockade had been removed, they knew that if they took a cargo on board before it was reimposed they would be entitled to come out. There was nothing illegal in their so doing, and no blame was to be attributed to them for it, provided they carried out their intention bonâ fide. Having taken the cargo on board before the end of January, the ship was unable to quit the port in consequence of the ice. When she attempted to leave there was not sufficient depth of water over the bar; part of the cargo was transferred to a lighter, and again put on board. There was no illegality in that, provided the Court was satisfied that it was the same identical cargo that was originally shipped on board. When, however, she came out of the Gulf of Riga, or even before, she was liable to detention by any of Her Majesty's cruizers who were maintaining the blockade established on the 19th of April, and it was the duty of the claimants to prove their title to restitution. Primâ facie, every vessel quitting a blockaded port was liable to comdemnation, and the claimants must make out an exception to the general rule. It never could be contended that such vessel was detained without probable cause. It was clear that the cargo could not have been restored without the ship; it was a participant in the lot and fate of the ship. If there was good ground for bringing the ship to this country, there was also good ground for bringing the cargo. The cargo has been restored, and he was very clearly of opinion that the claim for costs and damages with respect to it had no shadow of foundation; on the contrary, he was of opinion that he ought to decree the captors their expenses, more particularly as part of it had been unladen and again put on board. With regard to the ship nothing was more important than to take care that property brought in by cruizers was restored to no one except to the rightful owners. He was of opinion that it was no part of his duty to examine minutely into the municipal law of Denmark; the only purpose for which he could look into it was to see whether the property belonged bonâ fide to Danish subjects. The evidence of the master supported the statement of the claimants as to ownership, but the Court was also bound to look at the documentary evidence. The bill of sale differed from the evidence given by the master, and the statement of the claimants and other documents were discordant with them. On that ground the Court must order further proof, but there was an additional reason. The sale from the Russian to the Danish owners took place very hsortly after the commencement of the war. The Court, according to its ordinary rules, looked with great jealousy at a sale to a neutral subject at the commencement of a war. He could not take into consideration the second bill of sale being shown to the Queen's Proctor. It was irregular to attempt to introduce into the case evidence not properly before the Court, and was the strongest reason for directing further proof. The cargo must be restored on payment of the captors' expenses, and with respect to the ship there must be further proof.

1853-56

My Lord,

Austrian vessel "Nina."

Papers wanted.

IN consequence of what has transpired upon the inspection of the ship's papers of the Austrian ship "Nina," seized at Ipswich on suspicion of being Russian property, and reported on by me on the 28th June and 10th July last,* I have to request that either the original, or at all events a copy of the Italian memorandum of sale of that vessel transmitted to your Lordship by Count Colloredo, and which was, with the other papers, returned by me with my report of the 10th July, may be transmitted to the Admiralty Proctor, Doctors' Commons.

No. 350.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received July 21.)

Doctors' Commons, July 21, 1855.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th July instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 11th,† on the application of the Swedish Minister at this Court in favour of the "Gefion," he was directed to transmit to me a letter which your Lordship has received from Baron Hochschild in reply to the communication which your Lordship addressed to him founded on my report above referred to.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to add that in forwarding these papers to me he is to observe that your Lordship considers that it is quite impossible, in dealing with friendly, though neutral Powers, to refuse to supply the reasons upon which the decisions of Her Majesty's Government injurious to their subjects are founded.

Case of the "Gefion," built in Russia, and sold to Swedish merchants.

As to allowing her to leave Christiania with a guarantee against capture.

That your Lordship wishes therefore to know, with reference to my report of the 11th instant, whether the construction of a ship in Russia, and her subsequent transfer to a Swedish subject (supposing the transfer to have been a bonâ fide one), is contrary to our law, and would subject the ship to seizure and confiscation; and further with reference to my remark that the "Gefion" is alleged to have left Libau after the blockade was raised, your Lordship would wish to know whether there is anything illegal in such a proceeding; for when the raising of a blockade is publicly announced, it would seem that ships might go where they pleased without its afterwards being made a matter of charge against them. That I further add, with reference to the "Gefion's" departure from Libau, that it was "notwithstanding an unsuccessful application had been made to Her Majesty's Government in her favour"; but that your Lordship remarks, if you remember rightly, the application was for the "Gefion" to come out after Libau was blockaded. That no application was made after the blockade was raised, and this ground of charge cannot therefore apply.

Lastly, Mr. Hammond observes that the fact of the agents and builders at Libau having been concerned in some suspicious transfers of Russian ships cannot be alleged as a sufficient reason why the "Gefion" should be condemned to rot in a Swedish port until peace is concluded, unless Her Majesty's Government have some proof to give that the transfer of the "Gefion" was fraudulent.

In conclusion, Mr. Hammond states that your Lordship would be glad to receive at my earliest possible convenience my further observations on this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Such transfer not absolutely illegal.

But suspicious.

That the construction of a ship in Russia, and her subsequent transfer (flagrante bello) to a Swedish subject, supposing such transfer to have been a bonâ fide one, is not absolutely contrary to our law, and will not necessarily subject the ships to confiscation; such circumstances however are considered by our law very unfavourable and suspicious, and to be sufficient to justify the seizure of the ship, and to impose on her owners the duty of proving the bona fides of such a transaction to the satisfaction of a Prize Court; failing which she will be condemned.

Leaving port after raising of blockade not illegal, but not to be encouraged.

The leaving a blockaded port after the raising of the blockade is not illegal; but those engaged in such a proceeding cannot reasonably expect any special favour or encouragement from the blockading Power, especially where the enemy's ports have been permanently blockaded, so far as the ice will permit.

Onus of proof of bonâ fides is on the "Gefion."

Cannot recommend guarantee against capture.

Large numbers of fraudulent transfers, in consequence of flag covering cargo.

With reference to the circumstance of the agents and builders of the "Gefion" at Libau having been concerned in some suspicious transfers of Russian ships not being a sufficient reason why the "Gefion" should be condemned to rot in a Swedish port until peace is concluded, unless Her Majesty's Government have some proof to give that the transfer of the "Gefion" was fraudulent, I beg to observe that this does not appear to me to be the true aspect of the question. The "Gefion" may possibly not be captured, but the Swedish Government will have just cause of complaint if she should be captured, or to demand a special licence for her. The onus of proof of the bonâ fides is on the "Gefion," and not on Her Majesty's Government, which is not called upon to prove the transfer fraudulent. Baron Hochschild, in his note of the 30th July, appears to be perfectly aware of this; his Excellency admits the case is open to suspicion ("la complication de cette affaire pourant paraître suspecte"), and he requests from your Lordship "une declaration du Gouvernement Anglais qui lui permis de commencer ses courses sans crainte d'entrâves." That is, as I understand it, he requires a declaration or licence or formal guarantee for the "Gefion" against capture or seizure. Such a declaration, licence, or guarantee I cannot advise your Lordship to give. The "Gefion" does not appear to me to be entitled to this very special favour, of which there have been scarcely any instances during the present war. This, however, is of course a question of political expediency for your Lordship's decision rather than of strict law. The remarkable number of cases of fraudulent, and colourable transfers of Russian interests in ships to neutrals during this war has attracted the attention of the Judge of the Prize Court. The flag now covering the cargo, and the very large profit attending such transactions, afford strong temptations to fraud. Messrs. Sorensen and Gamper have been most prominent personages in this traffic, which has materially served to shelter and protect from capture a large portion of the Russian mercantile marine. I have hitherto conceived it (perhaps erroneously) to be my duty, to my utmost, not only to detect in Court, but to thwart, and oppose in my reports to your Lordship the development of this system, especially after the remarkable concessions which the Crown has already made in favour of neutral interests. This task is sufficiently arduous, and one which I need scarcely say I have neither interest nor pleasure in executing too rigorously. It cannot, I presume, be the desire of Her Majesty's Government to permit all vessels to pass unquestioned which are not certain to be condemned if seized, inasmuch as hostile interest would be greatly, though indirectly, benefited thereby.

Papers alone can never be depended on; in many of the most fraudulent Russian cases very unexceptionable neutral papers have been produced,

Exception in special case.

The Swedish flag has, however, hitherto maintained a very creditable exemption from fraud, and if it be thought advisable to make the particular concession suggested in this case, it would perhaps be desirable to make it upon this general ground rather than upon the special circumstances alleged with reference to the "Gefion," which may otherwise be inconveniently used as a precedent for similar applications.

Austrian vessel "Nina" seized at Ipswich.

WITH reference to Count Colloredo's note of the 20th instant, demanding the restoration of the "Nina," and the payment of an indemnity to her owners, I will confine myself strictly to the circumstances of the particular case, the question of the propriety of making this concession, on grounds of general policy, resting entirely with Demand for restoration on ground of correctness of papers.

Her Majesty's Government. Count Colloredo grounds his demand entirely upon the "Nina" being provided with the two papers required by the Austrian law.

1. The Imperial Pass or Patent.
2. The Scontrino, or document from the Minister of Commerce.

Papers not sufficient evidence.

I need scarcely point out that if papers alone can give to all neutral ships immunity from belligerent capture (at sea) or seizure (in harbour), there will be practically an end of belligerent rights. Such a right has not, as far as I am aware, been hitherto claimed by any nation; Danish and other ships have latin passes, issued in the Sovereign's name, but many pretended Danish vessels have been seized and condemned as Russians. Without Denmark ever having taken this ground, Count Colloredo asks for restitution as a matter (not of favour) but of right, and also asks for an indemnity for the owners. I cannot conscientiously advise Her Majesty's Government to give either, except as a special favour; if yielded, and compensation accorded as a right, I really do not see how similar demands are to be resisted, or how the belligerent rights of the Crown are to be maintained unimpaired.

Cannot recommend restoration or indemnity, except as special favour.

The passage marked relating to damage done to the "Nina" after the seizure is quite a separate matter, and will no doubt be investigated by the Customs.

I will only further observe that she has not yet been claimed by anybody, although her asserted owner (Gheracdovitch) has been here some time.

Ownership doubtful.

(2.) Although Count Colloredo alleges that the documents prove (b) "qu'il est de plein droit proprietaire du bâtiment," I am informed by the Admiralty Proctor that a letter has been found on board from Gheracdovitch to the master dated 6th June, 1855, stating "that he is not the sole owner, but has others to consult," or to this effect.

(3.) The master admits that he has corresponded since the war with a person at Odessa, as owner, who is not Gheracdovitch.

Formerly Russian.

(4.) Gheracdovitch appears to have been frequently at Odessa since the war.

(5.) The present master took command in 1851; she was then under the Russian flag.

(6.) She was built in England and has had at least two other names, the "Ocean" and the "Pio Nono."

No bill of sale, &c.

(7.) There is no "bill of sale" nor anything equivalent to it on board; no copy or duplicate of the documents in Italian forwarded by Count Colloredo was on board, and neither that nor any other document mentions the payment of any particular sum of purchase money; the master swears that he knows nothing of the price or of its actual payment.

The utmost diligence has been and will be used by the Admiralty Proctor; he hopes to be ready to go to a hearing in a fortnight; if a claim should be entered, any subsequent delay will depend on the claimant.

When Russian, was commanded by present master, who knows nothing about her sale.

The papers found on board are very voluminous, and are not yet copied or translated, and I am indebted to the Admiralty Proctor for the above information; except as to the master's deposition, which I have seen. I may remark that I cannot remember one honest case where the master (being in command at the date of sale) had no idea of the price given for the ship, or whether it was paid or still owning, and that if she turns out to be really owned by a person or persons domiciled at Odessa, neither the Emperor's Sign Manual nor the fact of the owner being a born Austrian will save her from being comdemned as "res hostium." As far as I can judge, in the present necessarily imperfect state of my information, I consider that if there is no claim, she will probably be condemned, and that in any event she will not be restored without "further proof," the result of which I cannot of course anticipate.

Will probably be condemned.

I beg to call your Lordship's attention to my recent report in the "Gefion,"* and to assure your Lordship that it is my anxious desire to assist and not to embarrass Her Majesty's Government; but that unless I receive some intimation of their general intentions and policy in this class of cases, I conceive it to be my duty to protect the interests of the Crown to the utmost of my ability. I am happy to be able to say (without the slightest idea of attributing anything to myself) that the Crown has been almost invariably successful in this critical class of cases, chiefly owing to the acuteness of the Custom-house officers and the indefatigable diligence of the Admiralty Proctor; and I can see neither any sufficient legal grounds for anticipating failure in this particular case, nor any reason for supposing that the Austrian Government will be able ultimately to sustain the peculiar ground which it has taken.

I remain, &c.

Blockade of Gulf of Bothnia.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty, covering copies of a letter and of its inclosures from Rear-Admiral Dundas, containing a notice of the blockade of Russian ports in the Gulf of Bothnia; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and draw up and transmit to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, a proper notification of the said blockade, to be inserted in the "Gazette" if I see no objection.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have accordingly prepared, and herewith transmit, a proper form of notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

Presume it is de facto.

I presume that the Admiralty are perfectly satisfied that the two extensive blockades in question (the latter including the Aland Islands), were in fact established by a competent force on the 12th and on the 14th of July respectively, as stated in the notification issued by the Admirals, which is carefully drawn.

Notification.

IT is hereby notified that the Right Honourable the Earl of Clarendon, K.G., Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty a copy of a communication from Rear-Admiral the Honourable R. S. Dundas, Commander-in-chief of Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the Baltic, inclosing a copy of a joint notification issued by him and by Rear-Admiral Penaud, Commander-in-chief of the Naval Forces of His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French in the Baltic, which notification is as follows:—

"It is hereby notified, in the name of Her Britannic Majesty Queen Victoria and His Imperial Majesty Napoleon III, Emperor of the French, that on the 12th day of July instant all Russian ports, roads, havens, and creeks in the Gulf of Bothnia from Tornea, in latitude 65° 46′ N., longitude 24° 7′ E., of Greenwich, to Nystadt, in latitude 60° 46′ N., longitude 21° 20′ E., of Greenwich, including especially the ports of Uleaborg, Brahested, Gamba Carleby, Ny Carleby, Wasa, Christinestadt, Biomeborg, and Ranmo, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of the Allied Fleets. And it is hereby further notified, with reference to the blockade of the coast of Finland between Nystad and Hango Head, and of the islands and islets fronting the said coast, established on the 15th ultimo, that on the 14th day of July instant, all other Russian islands fronting the coast of Finland, and all Russian islands in the Gulf of Bothnia, including especially the Aland Islands, were placed in a state of strict blockade by a competent force of the Allied Fleets; and it is hereby further notified that all measures authorized by the Laws of Nations and the respective Treaties between their Majesties and the different neutral Powers will be adopted and executed with respect to all vessels which may attempt to violate the said blockades.

As to answer to Danish Minister respecting costs when prizes are restored.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 12th July instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 30th ultimo, suggesting that the Danish Minister should be asked whether he is prepared to undertake that no claim for costs or damages shall be made in the Prize Court against the captors of vessels which may be released on his application, he was directed to transmit to me, for any observations I may have to offer thereupon, a note from General Oxholm, in reply to the note herewith inclosed, which was addressed to him by your Lordship upon the subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Prize Court decision in favour of right to capture vessels without risk of costs and damages.

That the recent Judgment of the High Court of Admiralty in the case of the "Otto and Olaf" has so materially strengthened the position of the Crown and of the captors in this class of cases, that I doubt the necessity of continuing the present discussion with General Oxholm. That Judgment has affirmed the right of captors to send in for adjudication every laden vessel coming out of a blockaded port without risk of costs or damages, and has also affirmed the principle that the conduct of the claimants or their agents having rendered the investigation necessary, they, and not the captors, must pay the costs, as a general rule, even if the result is favourable to them. I will however proceed to offer a few observations upon General Oxholm's note for your Lordship's consideration in case the discussson is continued. I have numbered (in pencil) some of the passages in his Excellency's note for the convenience of referring to them in the following observations by way of answer to each passage.

(1.) I would venture to point out that his Excellency appears to me to be in error in treating the capture of the "Dania" as unjustifiable, or in contending that this was admitted to be so by the Crown having consented to her being restored.

Capture of the "Dania" was legal.

Illegal to come out of blockaded port with cargo.

Restoration does not prove illegality of capture.

I beg to submit that her capture was perfectly legal and justifiable; she was not engaged "dans un trafic legal." This was the very question for decision. Primâ facie, it is illegal to come out of a blockaded port with cargo laden therein; it was for her to established her innocence at her own expense. She would only have been restored by the Court (after some necessary delay) upon the clearest proof of her innocence, and on paying the costs. The Crown, as an act of grace and favour under the particular circumstances of the case, promptly consented to her restoration, reserving the question of costs; but it did not thereby admit the capture to be unjustifiable, as erroneously supposed by his Excellency. Further, if it is to be contended that the Crown, by consenting to restore, has admitted the capture to have been unjustifiable, this will operate to prevent the Crown from affording any ground for such contention in future cases, by declining all interference. I may add that neutrals coming out of an enemy's port which they know to be blockaded, with cargo laden therein, act with their eyes open, and cannot reasonably complain of being subject to detention and investigation for so doing; nor can any blockade be effectually maintained if the belligerent does not strictly act upon the general principle above alluded to. Your Lordship will not fail to observe how the slightest concession is eagerly seized upon and made the ground of further demands.

Immediate sales allowable when there is danger of deterioration.

(2.) The ship and cargo can always be sold at once, if there be any danger of its deterioration; the Court is always anxious to facilitate such sales.

Captors must judge as to restoration.

(3.) The captors must be permitted to be the best judges of their own interests as to restoration; by restoring they abandon all prospect of obtaining condemnation of the prize or of securing themselves against all eventual risk of being condemned in costs and damages by obtaining an order for "further proof."

Course Her Majesty's Government would pursue in similar case.

(4.) With reference to his Excellency's question as to "what would have been the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in case a British vessel had been captured by a Danish cruizer for breaking the blockade of Hamburgh, when that port was blockaded by Denmark?" I can only say that if the Danish Government had replied to a remonstrance from Her Majesty's Government, by offering to restore the ship at once, provided all further litigation in a Danish Prize Court were abandoned by the claimants, I should (according to the best opinion I can now form, had your Lordship done me the honour of referring to me) have advised your Lordship to communicate the offer to the British owner, and to inform him that if he declined it he must be left to his own course without the further interference of Her Majesty's Government.

Belligerent right to capture all ships coming out of blockaded ports.

(5.) Upon the last point alluded to by his Excellency, your Lordship is already in possession of my opinion. I will only add in reference thereto, that the right of sending in for adjudication all laden ships coming out of a blockaded port without exception must, in my opinion, be treated and maintained as a clear belligerent right under the common law of nations, and not merely as a legal principle or rule of practice peculiar to British Prize Courts, upon which inferior ground it could not be safely maintained or enforced.

Exemptions may be granted as favours.

Exemptions from its operation may be granted as favours under special circumstances, but cannot safely be conceded as rights.

Greek vessels captured off the Danube for breach of blockade.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from M. Tricoupi, the Greek Minister at this Court, forwarding the complaints of the masters of four Greek ships whose vessels were captured by British cruizers off the mouth of the Danube for breach of blockade.

Mr. Hammond also incloses a correspondence between the Foreign Department and the Board of Admiralty respecting the capture of these vessels, and requests that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the Greek Minister's letter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, as I understand the facts, the Admiralty, in their letter to Lord Wodehouse of the 30th of March, have determined to release the vessels in question, and I find with the papers a draft of a letter to M. Tricoupi, dated April, so informing him. I presume, therefore, that they have been already released, and, if so, M. Tricoupi may be so informed.

If not already restored, case should be investigated at Constantinople.

If this is not the case, and they are still under detention, I can only suggest that Mr. Nicholson (the gentleman from Doctors' Commons recently sent by the Admiralty to Constantinople to attend to such matters) should be instructed to give his prompt attention to the cases of these vessels, and should act according to his instructions from the Admiralty, by either releasing them at once (if that is still the intention of the Admiralty) or by exercising his own discretion upon them after inspecting their papers, examining their masters, and investigating the circumstances connected with them.

M. Tricoupi may, in this event, be informed that the attention of the British authorities at Constantinople shall be forthwith directed to these cases.

The Queen's Advocate and the Attorney-General to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received August 14.)

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, August 14, 1855.

Firing on a flag of truce from Her Majesty's ship "Cossack," and capture of boat's crew by Russians.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 26th ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying correspondence respecting the detention as prisoners of war in Russia of the survivors of the boat's crew of Her Majesty's ship "Cossack," captured by the Russians at Hango, and to request that we would take the papers into our consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion whether, under the circumstances of the case, the Russian Government is authorized to retain Lieutenant Geneste and the others as prisoners of war, or whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in pressing for their release without being exchanged.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

As to right to detain them as prisoners of war.

That although it appears to us that the Russian force was guilty of an intentional violation of the sanctity which, among civilized nations, attaches to a flag of truce, yet, looking to all the circumstances of the case, we fear we cannot say that Lieutenant Geneste and his boat's crew had not transgressed the limits within which they should have kept in order to be entitled to the full protection against being made prisoners of war which a flag of truce should carry with it.

The grounds on which Prince Gortchakow rests the justification of the attack of the Russians on the boat's crew are in substance these:—

1. That the boat should have waited at some distance from the shore till the flag of truce was seen and acknowledged.

2. That no flag of truce was exhibited.

3. That the boat carried firearms (which he says had been recently used, for which latter allegation, however, there does not seem to be a shadow of pretence).

4. That Lieutenant Geneste and his boat's crew, having set on shore the Finnish prisoners, had fulfilled their mission, and had no business to be proceeding further inland.

Flag of truce not bound to wait until acknowledged.

As to the first point, we cannot admit the rule contended for by Prince Gortchakow, that a vessel or boat having a flag of truce is bound, on approaching an enemy's shore, to wait until the flag has been seen and acknowledged. Such a rule implies that there must always be a military or naval force immediately at hand. This, however, may not always be the case. The force with which it is desired to parley may be at a distance from the shore, and the communication which it is the object of the flag of truce to obtain might be rendered impracticable if such a rule were admitted.

We should contend that a flag of truce should operate as a protection when and wherever the party bearing it is bonâ fide proceeding to find the military or naval authorities with whom he is seeking to communicate.

No right to attack unarmed party.

As to the second point, even assuming (what it is difficult to believe) that the Russians did not see the flag of truce when displayed in the bow of the boat on her advance to the shore, there can be no doubt that at the time the attack was made the flag was fully shown and brought to the attention of the Russian officers. This, together with the fact that Lieutenant Geneste and his party on shore were wholly unarmed, ought at least to have secured to them the opportunity of parley, and of stating the purpose for which they had come, instead of which they and the persons in the boat were made the objects of indiscriminate and murderous attack.

The circumstances relied on by Prince Gortchakow under the third and fourth heads, as justifying the conduct of the Russians, clearly amount to no justification at all.

If it be true that there were arms in the boat, it is no doubt a circumstance to be regretted, as being inconsistent with the practice in respect to flags of truce. But it is to be observed that this circumstance (as the arms were in the bottom of the boat) could not have been known to the Russian force at the time they arranged their ambush and made their attack, neither did they know that the "Cossack's" boat had been sent on shore only for the purpose of landing the Finnish prisoners. The fact, therefore, undoubtedly stands that the Russian force made an attack upon a boat's crew of whom all they knew was that, while a part remained in their boat, those who came on shore were the bearers of a flag of truce and unarmed. It seems, therefore, impossible to acquit the Russian force of having wilfully violated the sanctity of a flag which all civilized nations agree in respecting.

That this attack and slaughter of the boat's crew, independently of its being a violation of the practice of civilized countries of respecting a flag of truce, was an outrage upon humanity and on the spirit in which warfare is conducted among Christian nations, is, we think, abundantly clear. It was an attack upon a party of men bearing a flag of truce, advancing, obviously, for no hostile purpose, seeing that those on shore, at all events, were unarmed, while, even if the whole had been armed, the vast superiority of the Russian force could leave them nothing to fear from affording the bearers of the flag of truce an opportunity of being heard.

While, however, we have no difficulty in taking this view of the conduct of the Russians in this unfortunate affair, and while we think Her Majesty's Government have a right to protest, in the face of the civilized world, against this most barbarous and unjustifiable proceeding, we cannot but admit that Lieutenant Geneste and his boat's crew so far departed from the strictly regular course of proceeding as to disentitle the British Government to claim, as a matter of right, that the prisoners should be set at liberty.

The boat's crew overstepped object of the flag of truce, and cannot claim to be released.

The misfortune of the case is that, upon the showing of Lieutenant Geneste himself, he and his boat's crew had, so soon as they had landed the Finnish prisoners, accomplished the purpose of their mission, and for which alone, so far as we are aware, they could desire to communicate with the authorities at Hango. Indeed, it seems plain that their real purpose in proceeding further into the place was to hold intercourse with the inhabitants, in the hope of obtaining fresh provisions as a return for the considerate act of liberating and landing the Finnish prisoners—a purpose harmless enough, no doubt, but still, in strictness, not within the scope of that part of their mission which would be legitimately covered by the flag of truce.

While, therefore, we are of opinion that the exhibition of the flag of truce ought clearly to have protected Lieutenant Geneste and his crew against being fired upon and slaughtered by the Russians, and to have entitled them to be heard, we cannot say, strictly speaking, that, the object of their mission and of the flag of truce having been accomplished, it entitled them to proceed into the place, or would have deprived the Russians of the right to make them prisoners when the circumstances became known. Had a parley taken place (as it clearly should have done), we think the Russians would have been entitled to detain Lieutenant Geneste and his party as advancing inland for purposes beyond those which the flag of truce was designed to protect. If, then, the circumstances were such as would have entitled the Russians to detain Lieutenant Geneste and his party as prisoners of war, we think Her Majesty's Government are not in strictness entitled to claim their liberation.

We have, &c.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received August 16.)

My Lord,

Doctors' Commons, August 15, 1855.

Saltpetre shipped from Lisbon for Hamburgh condemned by French Prize Court.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th of August instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 2nd of July,* upon the case of Messrs. Wienholt, Wehener, and Co., the parties interested in a quantity of saltpetre which was seized by a French cruizer on board the Hanoverian vessel "Frow Houvina," whilst on its way from Lisbon to Hamburgh, he was directed to transmit to me two further letters from Mr. Wienholt, together with their inclosures, and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship as to the course which should be pursued with regard to the further applications now inclosed from Mr. Wienholt.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am still of opinion that Her Majesty's Government should abstain from taking any step in favour of Mr. Wienholt. He has appealed from the decision of the French Prize Court, confiscating his property, to the Council of State, and he now appears desirous, pending such appeal, to extract some favourable statement or admission from your Lordship, of which he may avail himself, or to which he may refer, before the Council of State. I do not consider him entitled to receive any such favour. He further calls your Lordship's attention to what he describes as "the villainy planned in the British Consulate at Lisbon," into which he desires "a full and rigorous investigation," for which I see no sufficient grounds. Mr. Wienholt may not have violated the letter of the English law in this transaction, but he has, in my opinion, designedly evaded its spirit and intention, and both his agent at Lisbon and the master of the ship selected by that agent have acted throughout in a very disingenuous and suspicious manner. Those who apply for the interference of Her Majesty's Government, as litigants in the Prize Courts of an ally, should at all events "come with clean hands," and the hands of Mr. Wienholt's agents are by no means clean. He could not legally ship this saltpetre for any port north of Dunkirk, he therefore shipped it to Lisbon, formally "landed and entered it" there, and having thus obtained a British Consular certificate, immediately reshipped it for Hamburgh.

The mere fact of the decision of the French Prize Court being at variance with English law or practice, or even erroneous in principle (even if it be so) will not, in my opinion, necessarily, and of itself, justify the interference of Her Majesty's Government; Mr. Wienholt has appealed against this decision, and may perhaps succeed in reversing it, and whatever may be the result, he must, in my opinion, be left to bear the consequences of a transaction which, even if not illegal, was purposely contrived and conducted so as to baffle and evade the existing British policy and legislation, and which was carried out in a suspicious manner by agents whose conduct is at least very questionable.

Austrian vessel "Nina" condemned as prize.

WITH reference to the case of the Austrian vessel the "Nina," and to the communications with Count Colloredo, and to my previous reports thereon,* I beg to inclose a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Judgment recently delivered by the High Court of Admiralty condemning this vessel as prize. A copy of all the papers and depositions can be supplied by the Admiralty Proctor.

As to representation to Austrian Government.

The circumstances of the case are such as in my opinion to justify a communication being made to Count Colloredo or to the Austrian Government, if your Lordship should think it advisable to adopt that course. The Austrian authorities must either have been imposed upon by the parties interested, or they must have permitted the Austrian flag to be improperly used for the purpose of covering Russian property, and it is to be hoped that Count Colloredo was not aware of the real character of this case.

THE "NINA."

Judgment delivered by Dr. Lushington.

Judgment.

IT is admitted on behalf of the claimant in this case that he cannot ask for anything more than further proof in order to clear away the difficulties which it is asserted, and indeed not denied on the part of any one, exist in this case.

Now, having read all the papers before I came into Court, and having attended to all the observations of counsel on both sides, I think it wholly unnecessary to delay the decision which I am about to come to, being perfectly satisfied that I shall never change my mind in the view of this case, though perhaps if I occupied further time before I delivered my Judgment, I might make it a little more clear, or perhaps carry it to greater length, but I deem it unnecessary under the present circumstances.

Now, in this case the claim is made on behalf of a person of the name of Gherdacovich, of Costrena, in Austria, and it was stated that originally it was the intention of Baron Rothschild to have made the claim as Consul-General for Austria, and so it appears upon the face of this claim; now really that has nothing to do with the question which I am about to decide, for whether the claim is preferred by one individual or by another, the Court abides by its general rules and principles without any regard to persons or individuals. No doubt it was exceedingly proper in this master to take the advice of the Consul-General of the State to which he claimed to be a subject, and, for aught I know, he might have applied also to the Ambassador; but even if that were the fact, it would not make on the mind of the Court even the very slightest impression, for I am neither to be influenced nor in the slightest degree governed by the opinion of any person, nor by anything except what I deem to be the law of nations as administered in this Court. But one observation I will make, that if the master did make application to the Consul-General in due time, he was unfortunate that from some cause or other he did not receive that advice which would have enabled him, I trust, to have conducted himself with greater propriety than he has done towards the officer of Customs. Instead of affording every facility for bringing in the papers and the examination of himself and his crew, he folded his arms, and, if not actively engaged in preventing the inspection of those papers, rendered no aid, and certainly prevented the examination of himself and those on board; but I do not attribute that to the advice of his Consul. I should be exceedingly sorry so to do, because undoubtedly if that was so, whether it emanated from Consular or any other authority, it would tend to indispose the Court from giving due consideration to persons filling those high offices.

Obstacles placed in the way of investigation.

Legality of bonâ fide sale.

Now what are the facts of this case? The ship was originally a British vessel, but (as represented) became Austrian in the year 1853; at what particular time is uncertain from these papers, but undoubtedly the vessel was represented to be an Austrian vessel in the month of July 1853, though she did not become so till the month of November in the same year. Now, at that period, I have no hesitation in saying that if a Russian owner was desirous of changing her character by sale, it was competent for him so to do, and equally competent to the Austrian subject to buy it, provided only the transaction was fair and the Russian interest was divested, and the Austrian flag properly assumed under the authority of that country, that country not being deceived by any false representation, the owner being entitled to a national Austrian character. Now these things being so, this vessel has been claimed by M. Gherdacovich as the sole owner of this property, and the Court can decree restitution to this claimant on no other ground than that he himself is the person solely entitled to it, and if that case should be made out by further proof (which appeared to me to be a little inadvertently suggested to the Court), namely, that he had the legal title in this property, but in reality he and other persons were interested in the ship (be they who they may), unquestionably I could never restore on this claim. The Court will never restore on any claim unless it is satisfied that the property is bonâ fide the property of the individual who claims it, and if it finds any other interest lurking out in any shape, it is quite sufficient for me to pronounce against that claim.

Divided ownership. Fatal to restoration.

Doubtful nationality of owner.

Now there are two points that arise for the consideration of the Court in this case independently of the many questions and the many doctrines which have been ably discussed at the bar. The first question that necessarily arises may be a matter for further proof, but it is necessary I should notice it. Was M. Gherdacovich of Costrena or not? What do I find in the evidence? I find the master swearing in no very credible or satisfactory manner, first, that he had been resident at Costrena sixteen or seventeen years, and then afterwards adding he was resident at Odessa, but when and where he knew not, though it appears beyond all doubt and question that this M. Gherdacovich put him in possession of the ship in 1851 at Odessa. He might have had, I think, the means of giving us a little more satisfactory information of the residence of M. Gherdacovich at Odessa. But what do I find beside? Without entering minutely into the particulars of this case, I find M. Gherdacovich in 1854 resident at Odessa, both in the month of April and also of November. Now these circumstances excite very great suspicion as to whether M. Gherdacovich is really entitled to be considered an Austrian subject, according to the sense in which the words must be understood in this Court. It is not, as there seems to be a notion peeping out, that because this gentleman might have been born of Austrian parents that he might have been resident at Costrena, and he might have gone there occasionally or frequently, if he was carrying on trade and business at Odessa; if he was employed, as the ship has been, at Odessa, he never would be entitled to come before the Court and claim restitution in an Austrian character; he must be bound by the character of that place where he was resident and carrying on his trade, and to which the transaction properly belongs. I mention this because there seems to have been, at the commencement of the transaction when Austrian colours were assumed, matters throughout the papers which are explained in a very unsatisfactory manner to the Court. It seems to have been thought by the parties that they were at liberty to change the national character of the vessel without the slightest regard to the reality of the transaction, on the mere representation that they wished to obtain first Austrian colours and then any others that might suit the purposes of trade. If that be so (I do not say it is in the case of Austria, as I regret to say it has in other cases) the grant of the national flag has been made without a just regard to the rights of the belligerent. Now supposing I got over that, what is the next point? I have already said I can restore to nobody by possibility but M. Gherdacovich as sole owner. Now what is the state of the papers? I am told very cautiously, and counsel abstain from stating the mode and manner in which they would effect their object, but they tell me, if I will but shut my eyes and open my ears, they will find the means of proving M. Gherdacovich to be the sole owner; notwithstanding the documents under my eyes, they will find the means whereby, in reading them, I shall be able to put on them a construction totally and wholly incompatible with that sense which they bear upon the face of them. Now I ask how this is to be done? I repeat those words which I read before in the Argument: "I know you would be pleased to proceed on your voyage to the Adriatic; I would consent to it, but you know well that I am not the sole owner, and must execute the orders of my partners." Now if it were to be proved by any evidence produced in the case that this gentleman was sole owner, it would, as the learned Queen's Advocate has said, be in direct contradiction to the construction which any man of common sense must put on the words; but does the case rest here? Not only would it be in direct defiance of that meaning, but in direct contradiction of the whole of the correspondence, because there are letters upon letters in which Signor Cossio is represented as having an interest in this vessel, in which Anatra, living at Odessa, is represented as having an interest in the vessel; and when I see that the construction I put on these words (and no man living can put another) is in direct accordance with all the other documentary evidence, can I, under these circumstances, allow further proof, the very object of which would be to falsify the whole of the papers? I am of opinion that upon this ground alone I must not allow further proof; but there are in this case a variety of other reasons which fortify and justify, and which seem to demand from the Court, that determination which I have now expressed. I will make every possible excuse for this man being a foreigner, every possible excuse for his not understanding what is meant by a suppression of papers, but it is clear that he, through an agent, was concealing papers from the seizers, and preventing them obtaining possession of the papers which, by the law of nations, this Court is entitled to require; nor is this all; more unsatisfactory evidence the Court never had occasion to read. Can I believe this person was so ignorant of the ownership of this vessel that he could not have told me if the claim is such as it is represented to be, a sale or transfer in November 1853 to the present claimant? That he could not have given the Court some rational exposition of the subject? He who had been master from 1851, he who was appointed by the owners in 1851; there was that paper adverted to (No. 101), showing that in 1850 Cossio and Co. were owners; these are the words, "and Co.;" he must have known, what was obvious to every man of common sense, that this was a transfer; I do not say a culpable transfer, but a transfer for the purpose of getting rid of the Russian national character and taking the Austrian national character. He must have known who the Russian owners were who executed the conveyance, and he must have known something of the consideration which passed, if it was an honest and just transaction. I condemn this vessel, but I say more, it is the first Austrian vessel, and I regret that in the first case of a vessel coming under that flag it is my duty to pronounce that sentence. I shall always be ready to give that flag as indulgent a consideration as the law of nations will permit, but I say at the same time I trust that Government will take care not to allow their flag to be prostituted for the purpose of protecting the property of an enemy from the just rights of a belligerent.

---

* Nos. 349, 351, &c.

1853-56

Fictitious transfer from Russian flag.

Mathieson and Ritter's claim.

Timber destroyed at Uleaborg by Her Majesty's forces.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 20th July last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a statement signed by Mr. C. F. Mathieson, of the firm of Mathieson and Ritter, respecting a claim which they advanced against Her Majesty's Government on account of deals belonging to them which were destroyed at Uleaborg in June 1854, by Rear-Admiral Plumridge, also to transmit a letter from the Admiralty inclosing a report from that officer respecting his proceedings on that occasion; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon Messrs. Mathieson's claim.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Mathieson's claim does not appear to me to be entitled to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

No proof of ownership, or steps taken to distinguish from Russian property.

It was notorious, from April 1854 at latest, that Her Majesty's naval forces were about to commence active hostilities against the Russian ports in the Baltic, and it appears to me to be almost conclusive as against Messrs. Mathieson that they do not pretend that they made any representation to Her Majesty's Government on the subject of their timber at Uleaborg before it was destroyed in June 1854.

I have further to observe that it is not even alleged that the name of Messrs. Mathieson, or of any British merchant, as being the real owner of the timber, was ever mentioned to any of the British officers employed in destroying it, or that any particular property was pointed out to them being British property, or that the timber the destruction of which Messrs. Mathieson and Co. complain was in any manner separated or distinguished from the enemy's property of the same nature by which it was surrounded. Messrs. Mathieson must have had some agent or correspondent at Uleaborg in charge of their timber, and as the destruction of this property was deliberataly carried out without opposition, and after previous inspection and formal communication with the authorities by the British officers, it appears singular that such agents should not have requested the British officers to spare this particular property, or even have attempted to inform them of its precise position and nature. I beg to refer to my report upon a similar application from Messrs. Lewin and Co., of October 14, 1854.*

My Lord,

Austrian vessel "Anna Maria" captured in Sea of Azof.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th August last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Austrian Minister at this Court requesting the release of the Austrian vessel "Anna Maria," which was captured in the Sea of Azof by the allied squadrons. Mr. Hammond was also pleased to transmit to me a correspondence with the Admiralty and Count Colloredo on this subject, and to request my opinion upon the course which Her Majesty's Government should pursue in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

No ground for release.

That, assuming the identity of the ship and of the captain to be undisputed,† I concur with Admiral Lyons in thinking that this case is justly open to suspicion, and that there is no sufficient reason for releasing the "Anna Maria" without any further proceeding.

The petition for leave to come out of Kertch with a cargo (signed by the master of the "Anna Maria," as well as by other masters) was answered negatively by the allied commanding officers off Kertch on the 5th April, and Sir E. Lyons states that he was informed by Mr. Platt, an English engineer resident at Kertch, that the contents of that answer were "publicly known," but I understand Count Colloredo to state that no answer was received by the master of the "Anna Maria" until Kertch "had become the theatre of operations" (24th May). Even if no answer was received by the master, this would not justify him in leaving Kertch (which was blockaded) for Mariopol, and it is observable that his Excellency does not state with what object the "Anna Maria" sailed from Kertch to Mariopol, or whether she did so laden or in ballast, or why she did not, after being identified by the Austrian Consul, openly leave Kertch in ballast homewards or for some friendly or neutral port, even after its occupation, which (as her master and the Austrian Consul must have known) would have been permitted by the allied commanders. I need scarcely point out that if she left Kertch for Mariopol with any cargo on board, she broke blockade.

She had no right to leave Kertch while blockaded, unless in ballast.

It is also to be observed that their being an Austrian Consular Agent at Mariopol, where she was captured on the 2nd June, it is singular that no communication should have been made either to the captors or to the Admiral respecting this vessel at the time of her capture, even if the Russians did (for what reason is not alleged) compel her master and crew to abandon her and to land at Mariopol.

Suspicious aspect of case.

No colours or papers.

As the case is now represented, the "Anna Maria," whose previous conduct is suspicious, and which appears to have recently left an enemy's port under blockade, where she had remained for an unusual time, is captured in another enemy's port without colours or papers, and with no person on board, and no application is made at the time by any person on her behalf, although an Austrian Consular Agent, as well as her master and crew, are at that port; Count Colloredo states her to be an Austrian vessel, but it is possible that his Excellency may be misinformed on this point, as he certainly was in the recent case of the "Nina"; at all events the explanation offered by his Excellency of her previous proceedings is very imperfect; I cannot therefore see any sufficient reason for departing from the ordinary course, or for recommending her immediate release.

I would respectfully suggest that she should be forthwith proceeded against as prize according to Her Majesty's general instructions, and her Austrian owner may thereupon claim her in the usual manner, and that Count Colloredo may be so informed.

My Lord,

Greek vessels "Chriseis" and "Aspis" captured while breaking blockade near Odessa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th August last, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty (and its inclosures) reporting the circumstances under which two Greek vessels, the "Chriseis" and "Aspis," were captured by Her Majesty's ship "Niger" whilst attempting to break the blockade of the Russian ports near Odessa. That he was also directed to transmit to me a letter from M. Tricoupi, the Greek Minister at this Court, stating the circumstances under which he has been informed that the vessels in question were captured, and requesting that they may be released, and their owners compensated for their detention; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to M. Tricoupi's application.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th of August stating that, with reference to the above, he was directed to transmit to me a further letter from M. Tricoupi, together with its inclosures, relating to the case of the "Chriseis," and to request that I would take the papers now inclosed into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot be released without further information.

That without seeing the ship's papers and depositions in these cases it is impossible for me to advise your Lordship to comply with M. Tricoupi's request, or even to recommend the simple restoration of these vessels; and that he must be informed that your Lordship cannot at present accede to his application. The letters relating to the "Chriseis" (copies of which are forwarded) certainly seem favourable to her, and both she and the "Aspis" appear to have been incurring considerable risk of capture without any adequate temptation by going to Odessa. On the other hand, the place in which each was captured, and the answers and behaviour of the masters and crews, as set forth in the reports of the captors to Sir E. Lyons, appear entirely inconsistent with an honest destination to the Danube.

Suspicious circumstances.

Actuary at Constantinople must decide as to their restoration.

The attention of Mr. Nicholson (the Actuary sent to Constantinople by the Admiralty) may be usefully directed to these cases, and if he should see no probability of their being condemned upon the depositions and ship's papers (bearing in mind that no evidence will be admitted on behalf of the captors), they may be restored.

My Lord,

May Austrian merchant at Trieste send neutral vessels to Russian ports to fetch corn bought before the war?

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th September instant, transmitting to me a note from the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, requesting that M. Spiridion Gopcevich, an Austrian merchant of Trieste, may be allowed to send vessels under a neutral flag to Russian ports in the Sea of Azoff, to convey from thence corn purchased by him before the war. Mr. Hammond requests that I will report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer that should be given to this request. He adds that your Lordship wishes to have this opinion at my earliest convenience, and before he communicates with the French Government, to whom, of course, a similar request will have been made.

I have accordingly taken the note in question into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

Only by a special licence, with concurrence of France.

That all the ports in the Sea of Azoff being blockaded, the permission sought for by the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires in favour of M. Spiridion Gopcevich must, if granted at all, be by licence under the Sign-Manual, and must, of course, be granted with the consent of the French Government.

No such licence has been granted during the present war as far as I am aware, although many similar applications have been received.

Information not sufficient.

No grounds for allowing.

I have further to observe that no particulars are given as to the quantity of grain or as to the amount of tonnage in question; no reason is given why this corn (purchased in 1853) was not exported either before the war or before the blockade of the Sea of Azoff, or why this special permission was not requested at an earlier period, especially on the blockade of the ports in the Sea of Azoff being notified. I cannot, therefore, at present see any sufficient grounds for advising your Lordship to assent to this request.

The considerations of policy which are adverted to in the note, and the fact that the National Bank of Austria is deeply interested on behalf of the house of Gopcevich, are matters beyond my province, and exclusively for your Lordship's consideration.

French law.

Captured vessels cannot be bought by any but French subjects.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th September instant, transmitting to me, by your Lordship's direction, a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Cherbourg, calling the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the unfair working of the French law, which prescribes that captured vessels can only become the property of Frenchmen, and cannot be sold to foreigners.

Mr. Hammond requests that I will report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience whether any law similar to that which exists in France on this subject is in force in England.

I have accordingly the honour to report—

No such law in England.

That no law similar to that which is stated by the Consul to exist in France on this subject is in force in England.

Foreigners, and in some cases the former owners of neutral ships, have, I believe, during the present war, purchased ships when condemned and sold as prizes.

The Marshal of the Admiralty will be able to supply the best information on the subject of the purchase of prizes by foreigners in England, of which information your Lordship may perhaps desire to be in possession before communicating with the French Government on this subject.

Doctors' Commons, September 17, 1855.

Shipment of arms at Boston in American vessels for Russian Government.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th September instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, inclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Derby of Boston, communicating some information he has obtained respecting the expected shipment on board American vessels at that port of arms destined for the use of the Russian Government, and to request that I would take Mr. Derby's letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship at my earliest convenience on the statements made therein, and the mode of proceeding which it would be best for Her Majesty's cruizers to pursue in regard to the alleged intended shipments.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Purchase of saltpetre at Calcutta.

Neutral State to whom consigned may be required to prevent its reaching Russia.

That the statements made in Mr. Derby's letter relating to the Russian contracts for gunpowder in the United States and the intended purchase of saltpetre at Calcutta by a Russian agent, do not appear to involve any legal point or to require any observations from me. The neutral state to which such gunpowder may be exported from the United States may fairly be required to prevent its reaching Russia, and the Governor-General of India in Council will, I presume, be able to prevent the exportation of the saltpetre alluded to, either by some special measure or by the general interdiction of the export of saltpetre, except to such places or under such circumstances as shall prevent its reaching the enemy.

Arms, &c., concealed in bales of cotton.

Vessel may be visited,

With reference to the statements in Mr. Derby's letter concerning the proposed shipment from a port of the United States, and in a United States' merchant vessel, of "a cargo of rifles and gunpowder concealed in bales of cotton and cases of logwood under papers for some port in the Baltic or some neutral port," I have to observe that if credible information should be furnished that such a shipment has been actually made in a particular vessel, and that such vessel should be met with upon the high seas bound to any port in the Baltic, the vessel should be visited, her papers examined, and she should be carefully searched, and if a cargo of rifles and gunpowder should be found concealed on board, she should be sent before the High Court of Admiralty for adjudication.

but with considerable risk to captor.

Her Majesty's Government may take the risk.

Contraband of war may be carried to neutral ports.

I must add that, after the concessions made by the Orders in Council, any such search or capture will be made at considerable legal risk to the captors and to Her Majesty's Government, in case of any mistake or misinformation as to the particular vessel or her cargo or destination; the object, however, is so important that I apprehend Her Majesty's Government will readily incur the risk of paying the costs and damages on behalf of the captor, and of apologizing to the United States, if necessary. With reference to Mr. Derby's phrase "or to some neutral port," I have further to remark that contraband of war may be legally carried by neutrals to neutral ports under whatsoever circumstances, unless designed for the enemy's use; that consequently there are many neutral ports (as, for instance, South American and Mediterranean ports to which such a vessel may legally sail, even under the circumstances described, without hindrance from the allies.

Capture must be justified by suspicion.

Captors may not bring evidence.

In order to justify the capture of a neutral vessel for carrying contraband of war, it must appear from the ship's papers, from her course and destination, from the place of capture, the admitted circumstances, and the answers of her master and crew to the "standing interrogatories," that there exists sufficient ground for presuming that the contraband was actually destined for the use of the enemy. The captors will not be permitted to adduce any evidence, at all events in the first instance.

Sensitiveness of United States.

I need scarcely add that inasmuch as no United States' vessel has been captured during the present war, the captors should bear in mind the peculiar sensitiveness of the United States as to neutral rights, and should observe the utmost caution in their conduct and demeanour.

I have, &c.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received October 3.)

Doctors' Commons, October 2, 1855.
My Lord,

Insertion of owners names in passes of Danish vessels.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th September instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Danish Chargé d'Affaires at this Court, stating that the names of all the owners of Danish vessels will in future be inserted in latin passes; and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make upon this communication.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I request to be furnished with two copies (with translations) of the Danish Government Circular of the 31st August alluded to by Count Reventlow.

With reference to the following passages in his Excellency's note: "un des motifs que l'on a assigné pour cette saisie est que les noms de tous les armateurs auxquels ils appartenaient ne se trouvaient pas insérés dans le passeport latin;" and "toutefois le Gouvernement du Roi pour ne plus exposer nos bâtiments à une saisie non fondée;"—I beg to observe that his Excellency abstains from giving the names of any single Danish vessel actually seized on the ground alleged, and that his Excellency has either been misinformed or that he has not quite correctly apprehended the facts to which he alludes.

1853-56

No Danish vessels seized for its omission.

No Danish vessel, as far as my knowledge extends, has been seized upon any such ground whatsoever; several vessels under Danish colours have been seized for breach of blockade, and on suspicion of being in fact Russian property. The Danish claimant has often in such cases alleged that he had purchased the vessel from a Russian, either after war was imminent, or "flagrante bello," and amongst other defects in the ship's papers it has appeared that the names of the claimants who have sworn that they were the sole owners did not correspond with the names of the owners inserted in the latin pass. This latter circumstance has been remarked upon by me and by the Court as furnishing a sufficient ground, not for condemnation, but "for requiring further proof," since it was impossible in such a state of things, without further proof, to determine to whom the ship, even if not Russian, really belonged. These I firmly believe to be the facts to which his Excellency alludes in the passages cited, and if so it will be obvious to your Lordship that the seizure was not "une saisie non fondée." The opinion of M. Kraft, an eminent Danish lawyer, in the "Otto and Olaf," transmitted to me for my information on the 27th August last, affords some important information as to great irregularities apparent on the face of that ship's papers. Nor can it be reasonably urged as a hardship that the Court required further proof before restoring to the claimant property which upon the face of the very instrument produced by him to prove his title thereto appeared to belong to others.

But proof required that vessels were not Russian property.

With respect to these defects in the papers being "un des motifs qu'on a assigné pour cette saisie," this is not strictly the case, the capture having been in all such cases made on other and distinct grounds, viz., breach of blockade, or Russian interest in the ship. I trust that I shall be excused for again calling your Lordship's attention to the peculiar position of Denmark with reference to the abuse of her flag by Russians.

Abuse of Danish flag.

I have not yet seen the Parliamentary Return of captured vessels which I observe by the newspapers has been recently published, but I beg to remark that about one half of all the vessels under neutral flag hitherto seized in British ports as being really Russian property have come here under Danish colours, and with false Danish papers, and have been falsely claimed as Danish ships; the total number of ships seized in British ports under neutral flags has been about 31, of which 14 were under Danish colours, and of these 14 pretended Danes, no less than 11 have been already found to be Russians in disguise and condemned as such; this in my humble opinion places Denmark in a very exceptional position in this respect towards Great Britain as a belligerent, and renders it almost certain that in a much larger number of cases many pretended Danes have escaped detection, and that Russian ships are still in numerous instances fraudulently protected under the Danish flag. Under these circumstances it will be for your Lordship's consideration whether it is not Her Majesty's Government, rather than that of Denmark, which is in entitled to complain, and even to adopt more active measures to check these frauds, and whether some intimation to this effect should not be conveyed to Count Reventlow in answer to his intimation that Danish vessels have been seized upon insufficient grounds.

Vessel chartered at Rotterdam to convey sulphur to Hamburgh.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letters of the 8th October instant transmitting to me by your Lordship's desire a despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague stating the circumstances under which a vessel has been chartered at Rotterdam to convey a cargo of sulphur from that port to Hamburgh, and requesting that I will favour your Lordship at my earliest convenience with my opinion as to the power of Her Majesty's Government to stop this vessel.

I have accordingly taken this despatch into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot be stopped.

That it does not appear to me that, under the circumstances stated in these papers, Her Majesty's Government have any power to stop the vessel in question, which

I observe is stated to be bound from one neutral port to another, there being nothing to show that her cargo of sulphur is in fact destined for the enemy's use.

Sulphur at Rotterdam for Hamburgh, packed in sugar boxes.

I AM favoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 10th October instant, in which he states that, with reference to his letter of the 8th October instant, he is directed by your Lordship to transmit to me a further despatch from Mr. Paget, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at the Hague, relative to the vessel at Rotterdam loading sulphur for Hambugh, and he is to request that I will take this despatch into my consideration, together with the despatch which is already before me.

I have accordingly taken this despatch into my consideration, and have the honour to report—

If falsely described, it alters complexion of case.

That the circumstances of the sulphur being packed in Havannah sugar-boxes will not of itself suffice to justify the stoppage of the ship; if it should appear to be falsely shipped or described or entered in the ship's papers as sugar (from the Havannah or elsewhere), or that its real destination or description should be otherwise concealed or falsely stated, this might alter the complexion of the case.

Netherlands vessels "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida" detained in Black Sea by Her Majesty's cruizers.

Compensation.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th August last, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 4th July last,* and to previous correspondence respecting the claim to compensation advanced by the Netherlands Government on behalf of the owners of the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," in consequence of the alleged unjust detention of those vessels by the cruisers of Her Majesty's squadron in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me two notes from the Netherlands Minister at this Court, containing further particulars in regard to this matter, and to request that I would take Baron Bentinck's notes, together with the former papers, which are sent therewith, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which I think it advisable for Her Majesty's Government to pursue in this case. I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th October instant, returning me translations of the Dutch papers in Baron Bentinck's notes of the 27th and 30th August last, relating to the "Sjouke Alida" and "Catherine," as requested in my letter of the 13th September last.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Claim for freight for return journey inadmissible.

Could not have returned through blockade with cargo.

That with reference to the first item in the statement of damages in each of these cases, viz., "freight according to charter-party, entered into at Constantinople for a return cargo from Galatz to Cork or Falmouth, &c.," I beg to observe that such item appears to me to be wholly inadmissible, and that although the Netherlands Government have "approved this demand and rely on its exactitude," I cannot understand the principle upon which they have done so. If there were no other objection to this item, the unreasonable nature of the demand in this respect must be apparent from the fact that these ships were captured May 31st, off the Sulina mouth of the Danube, inward bound, and that the Danube was blockaded on the 1st June; even if allowed to enter unmolested, they could not, therefore, have arrived at Galatz, and there laden a cargo (as per charter-party) before the 1st June, and it would have been a breach of blockade on their part to have come out of the Danube with any cargo laden after that date; in other words, the loss of this charter-party (from Galatz) was in no respect occasioned by their detention or capture, but was necessarily incidental to the institution of the blockade of the Danube on the 1st June, and would have certainly befallen them by reason thereof if they had entered the Danube without any impediment. Such blockade, moreover, was a contingency for which (considering the dates and circumstances) they could not have been altogether unprepared, and in respect of which they cannot pretend to have any claim for compensation.

Loss of freight not occasioned by detention.

Claim for demurrage excessive.

With reference to the third item, viz., "loss of time for forty-six days," for which demurrage at 5*l*. a-day is claimed, I have to observe that this period or number of days appears to me to be excessive. I consider that to allow demurrage for the number of days actually occupied in returning to Constantinople after their liberation and there discharging cargo and preparing for another voyage (say twenty days), will be a very liberal remuneration in this respect. They might obviously have obtained freight at and from Constantinople, and Her Majesty's Government cannot be bound to pay them demurrage up to the time of their arrival at Kertch, whither they went from Constantinople. Her Majesty's Government will, in my opinion, act most liberally towards the owners by paying the freight from Constantinople to Galatz (which they would have earned but for the detention), and by further allowing them demurrage for the time actually occupied in returning to Constantinople, and there preparing for another voyage. They do not appear to have any right to demurrage in respect of the time occupied by their voyage from Constantinople to Kertch.

The second and fourth items do not appear to me to be open to any observations.

Suggests arbitration or reference to experienced person.

Considering that the only question between the two Governments is now one of the amount of compensation, and bearing in mind the unsatisfactory results which may attend the further discussion of these items between the two Governments (now that the Netherlands Government has adopted in all its particulars the unreasonable claim of the owners), I would venture to suggest that your Lordship, whilst objecting to these two items on principle, might consider it advisable to offer to leave the amount to be paid to be determined by arbitration, or if this should not appear advisable to your Lordship, I would then suggest that all the items should be submitted to some person of local commercial experience at Constantinople familiar with the rate of charges and general state of affairs existing there at the time, and its effect upon neutral commerce.

My Lord,

Austrian vessel "Nina." Appeal against decision of Prize Court.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th October instant stating that, with reference to my report of the 19th of August last,[*] he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at this Court stating that an appeal will be made against the decision of the High Court of Admiralty in the case of the "Nina," but requesting further information for his Government respecting the grounds of the seizure as well as an explanation of the Judgment; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon the answers which should be returned to Count Karolyi.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Case is "sub judice," and must not be discussed with Austrian Minister.

That the answer which in my opinion should be returned to Count Karolyi should be to the effect that this case being still "sub judice" and under appeal, it would be obviously inconvenient, useless, and unreasonable, pending the appeal which has been asserted by the claimants, for your Lordship either to discuss the grounds of the Judgment appealed from, or to state the facts which led to suspicions being originally entertained as to the national character of the "Nina," and which caused the seizure and the institution of proceedings against that vessel.

I beg to add some further remarks upon Count Karolyi's note, leaving to your Lordship's consideration the propriety of adverting to any or all of them in the reply which may be forwarded to such note.

That note appears to admit in effect that the Imperial Government cannot impugn the Judgment upon any broad or clear grounds, for it wholly omits to do so; it merely reiterates the utterly untenable argument for the liberation of the ship originally adduced by Count Colloredo, viz., that she had a complete set of Austrian ship's papers. It appears to me that if the Imperial Government was resolved to renew this discussion and to request further explanations from Her Majesty's Government pending the appeal, and after having had an opportunity of considering the Argument and Judgment, it should at all events have attempted to deal with some of the grounds upon which that Judgment purports to be founded.

Plea that her papers were Austrian.

Opinion of claimant's counsel.

The Claimant's case was argued by two of the ablest Counsel in the Kingdom (Dr. Addams and Dr. Twiss), who are perfectly able to offer any explanations of it; these learned gentlemen, moreover, commenced by admitting that they could not ask for restitution, and only sought to be permitted to adduce further proof; thus, in effect, admitting that, notwithstanding the previous peremptory assertions and demands of the Imperial Legation, the case was one of justifiable seizure, and open to grave suspicion, and I would therefore submit that Count Karolyi may be referred to them for the "grounds of suspicion" which induced them to adopt this course. It would be useless to repeat and enforce the reasons which the Court gave for refusing this request; they are to be found in the Judgment, and their validity is the very point now under appeal.

Justifiable seizure.

The request contained in the note for the communication of the grounds of suspicion which led to the seizure of the "Nina" appear to me most extraordinary and unreasonable, especially at this late period, and after the Argument and Judgment. Whatever may have first given rise to such suspicions, it is now obvious that these suspicions were well-founded.

Grounds of suspicion.

I can only repeat what I have stated in my previous reports, that the "Nina" was not seized or originally proceeded against on my advice, but by orders from the Admiralty, pursuant to the advice of the Admiralty Advocate and Proctor, and that I am wholly unaware of the original grounds of suspicion against her. Whatever those grounds may have been, I can only say that the pressing and peremptory tone originally adopted by the Austrian Legation, and its assertion that the Imperial pass ought of itself to be satisfactory, coupled with the refusal of the master to submit to examination or to give up the ship's papers, convinced me at an early stage of the proceedings that the case would not bear investigation. Whilst, therefore, the original grounds of suspicion which led to the seizure must be sought from the Customs or the Admiralty, some of the additional grounds of suspicion which soon became apparent will be found detailed in a (private) letter written by me to Lord Wodehouse (who conversed with me on the case by your Lordship's desire) shortly before the hearing took place.[*]

If this discussion of the case by the Austrian Government is to be further proceeded with, I would suggest that the depositions and all the papers should be forthwith printed by the Admiralty Proctor, as, without frequent reference thereto, it will be impossible to offer any intelligible observations thereon.

Case turns on facts as to nationality.

I may observe that the case does not appear to me to offer any very new or striking feature, or to involve any novel or peculiar questions of international law; it chiefly turns upon facts and dates connected with the alleged purchase of the ship from Russians by the claimant, upon his being (as he swears) or not being the sole owner, and as to his true domicile being Russian or Austrian.

Upon the whole, however, I would venture respectfully but decidedly to advise your Lordship to decline the present discussion as inopportune and unreasonable pending the appeal, the result of which may entirely change the aspect of the question.

whether the vessel, if purchased by an American citizen, could be resold to a British subject and then obtain a British register, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to inclose two previous despatches from Mr. Crampton, as bearing upon this subject, one of which is now referred to by him, as well as my report upon them dated the 8th November last.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Consuls must not certify to transfers.

That Her Majesty's Consuls should on no account give any such certificates as alluded to, or any certificates at all as to transfer in foreign ports of Russian vessels to neutrals or British subjects.

As to papers necessary for an American ship.

I have already on previous occasions called attention to the impropriety of such documents being issued by Her Majesty's Consuls, and to the serious inconvenience which may result therefrom. It will be for your Lordship to consider whether the United States should be now again requested to give a direct answer to this simple question, already answered by almost all neutral nations, although not answered by the United States (as shown in my previous report 8th November, 1854), viz:—

"What ship's papers is every United States' merchant-vessel required by United States' law to have on board?"*

An answer to this question would appear to be the more requisite if United States' merchants purchase Russian ships flagrante bello, bearing in mind the numerous frauds already detected in this class of cases under other neutral flags, and adverting to the fact that a very large portion of the Russian commercial marine is probably at this moment disguised under various neutral flags.

Netherlands ships "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida" detained in Black Sea by British cruizers.

As to assessing compensation to owners.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th November instant, stating that, with reference to my letter of the 25th ultimo,* respecting the claim to compensation advanced by the Netherlands Government on behalf of the owners of the "Catherine" and "Sjouke Alida," in consequence of the detention of those vessels by the cruizers of Her Majesty's squadron in the Black Sea, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a letter from the Admiralty stating that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty are of opinion that, as the illegality of the capture is of necessity admitted, and as no evidence in justification thereof is forthcoming, compensation should be made in the same manner as if the vessels in question had been restored after proceedings in a Court of Prize, with an award of costs and damages against the captors; and is pleased to request that, in again taking this case into consideration, I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon what principle such compensation would be assessed by the Court under such circumstances, and what sum should be tendered as amends to the Netherlands Government for the use of the owners of the vessels; and furthermore, whether, in the event of that Government refusing, in the interest of the owners, to accept the amount offered, a proposal should be made to submit the question of the principle on which compensation is to be assessed to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and the assessment of the amount upon such principle to the Registrar of that Court.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I beg to refer to my previous report of the 25th October for an explanation of the principle on which I conceive that compensation would be assessed by the Court of Admiralty under the circumstances suggested.

I must add that, in such cases, it is not easy to lay down any definite principle. Counsel are very rarely consulted or employed therein, and such cases very rarely come before the Court. The Registrar and merchants, in settling the amount of compensation, are guided by usage, by their own experience, and by the custom of merchants.

Question of account and mercantile usage.

Suggests sum to be offered.

The amount to be tendered to the Netherlands Government for the use of the owners of each vessel is a matter of account, and of mercantile usage, upon which I would again respectfully submit the propriety of consulting a person of mercantile experience. Subject to this suggestion, and, as far as I can understand the accounts submitted by the owners, and can apply to them the principles laid down in my report of the 25th October, 235*l.* sterling will be a sufficient tender in the case of the "Catherine," and 225*l.* sterling in that of the "Sjouke Alida;" at all events, whatsoever sum will cover the freight which would have been earned on the voyage interrupted, and the damage to the vessel, plus twenty days' demurrage at 5*l.* per day, will be a sufficient tender in each case.

In the event of the refusal of the Netherlands Government to accept these amounts, the proposal suggested appears to me to be extremely liberal on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Rule for payment of costs of reference.

If such a proposition is made, and if the original, or present demand (now adopted by the Netherlands Government) should be submitted to the Court, or to the Registrar and merchants, and if the Court, or the Registrar and merchants, do not pronounce in favour of the demand to the extent of two-thirds of the whole amount claimed, the costs of the reference should be defrayed by the claimants, agreeably to the ordinary practice in such cases.

sulphur (the article of which Russia now stands most in need), are transported to Russia in neutral vessels through neutral ports in such quantities, and with such complete impunity, that he was directed to request that we would once more consider the subject with reference to the accompanying despatches from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Hamburgh and the practice of the French Government in such matters; and to report whether we can advise Her Majesty's Government as to any measures which can be taken to put a stop to a trade with the enemy so injurious to the interests of Great Britain and the Allies.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Measures to be adopted to stop it.

That we beg to refer to our Reports of the 27th March and 24th May last,* in which we have distinctly pointed out the measures which would, in our opinion, be strictly legal, and would be well calculated to stop, or at least to interrupt, the traffic in question. We would also refer to an opinion given on the 6th December instant by the Queen's Advocate, the Admiralty Advocate, and the Counsel to the Admiralty, on a case upon this subject submitted to them from the Admiralty.

Search the vessels, &c.

The first measure to be adopted is to search every vessel bound to the ports in question; the searching officer must be guided by the circumstances of each case in the exercise of his discretion as to capturing and sending in for adjudication. Some risk of costs and damages must, of course, be incurred; in the case of British vessels more strictness may be shown than with neutrals.

If French Law is more strict than British, let French ships perform the service.

With reference to the "practice of the French Government in such matters," we can only say that if that practice is in effect more adverse to neutral rights than our own in this particular respect, the duty of interrupting the traffic should be performed by French men-of-war. From the Judgment in the case of the "Vroun Houvria," 26th May, 1855 (as given in the printed Report inclosed), we infer that the French law and practice is more favourable to belligerent rights than that of England. This, however, can easily be ascertained from the Imperial Government or Law Officers.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th of December instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Admiralty reporting that the blockade of the Russian coast in the Baltic was entirely raised on the 10th instant, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and if I see no objection to draw up and transmit a notification of the raising of the said blockade for insertion in the "London Gazette."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I infer from the letter of the Admiralty that all the Russian ports in the Baltic the blockades of which have been notified at various dates during the present year have remained blockaded until the 10th December instant, and that on that day such blockades were simultaneously raised.

On this assumption, I see no objections to the issuing of a notification in the "Gazette," which I have accordingly prepared and herewith transmit.

Notification.

IT is hereby notified that the Right Honourable the Earl of Clarendon, K.G., Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty an official communication stating that it appears by a report from Rear-Admiral Baines, dated "Her Majesty's steam-vessel 'Retribution,' Copenhagen, 12th December, 1855," that the blockade of all ports, roads, havens, and creeks belonging to the enemy in the Baltic was entirely raised on the 10th instant.

Mr. Wienholt's saltpetre seized on board Hanoverian vessel on voyage from Lisbon to Hamburgh.

Condemnation confirmed by French Conseil d'Etat.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from Mr. Wienholt, stating that the French Conseil d'Etat has confirmed the confiscation of the saltpetre belonging to him, which was seized by a French war steamer on board the Hanoverian vessel "Vrow Howina" whilst that vessel was on her passage from Lisbon to Hamburgh in the course of last year, and to request that I would take this case again into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government should ask the French Government for the reasons which have induced the Conseil d'Etat to reject Mr. Wienholt's appeal, and whether your Lordship should adhere to the former answer given to Mr. Wienholt.

Mr. Hammond is pleased to add the former papers belonging to this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

"Jugement motivé."

Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere.

That I have not seen any report of the Judgment of the Conseil d'Etat in this case, but Mr. Wienholt has evidently seen it, for he cites a passage from it verbatim. From this it would appear that the Judgment is what is called in France a "Jugement motivé," and that it contains the reasons which induced the Conseil d'Etat to reject Mr. Wienholt's appeal. I cannot, therefore, advise an application to the French Government for these reasons.

Under all the circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that your Lordship should adhere to the answer given to Mr. Wienholt, and should refuse to apply to the French Government in his favour.*

My Lord,
Doctors' Commons, February 18, 1856.

Arsenals to be maintained in the Black Sea. Does "Black Sea" include adjoining waters?

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th February instant, stating that we should perceive from the passages marked in the inclosed paper that it is proposed that the respective Governments of Russia and Turkey should not establish or maintain in the Black Sea any "arsenaux militaires maritimes," and should not keep afloat in the Black Sea any greater number of vessels of war than may be required for the service of their coasts; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we, at our earliest convenience, would report to your Lordship whether, under the ordinary legal acceptation of the word "Sea," the Sea of Azoff and the lower parts of the Bug and Dnieper, from and including the arsenals of Nicolaieff and Kherson, and also the Straits of the Bosphorus, by which the waters of the Black Sea reach the Archipelago, and the arsenal of Constantinople, situated in a bay of the Bosphorus, immediately at its junction with the Sea of Marmora, are all or any of them properly to be considered as portions of the "Black Sea," and, as such, subject to the limitations above specified in regard to arsenals and vessels of war.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Black and Azoff Seas distinct; also Bosphorus.

That the question is rather one of geography than of international law. We would, however, remark that the Black Sea and the Sea of Azoff have from the earliest times been known and distinguished by different appellations.

The ancient geographers always distinguished the Palus Mœotis from the Pontus

---

* Nos. 291 and 326.

* See also No. 355*.

1853-56

Euxinus, and ancient classic writers speak of the narrow Strait which connects them as Ostia Ponti.

Geographically, if two seas are connected by a strait, they are regarded as distinct from each other, and the Sea of Azoff is as distinct from the Black Sea as the Mediterranean from the Atlantic.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the Sea of Azoff cannot be considered as included under the term "Black Sea."

As to the Rivers Bug and Dnieper.

The next question relates to the Rivers "Bug and Dnieper, from and including the arsenals of Nicholaieff and Kherson."

Upon looking at the best charts (which seem to be the French), it will be seen that the Rivers Bug and Dnieper discharge themselves into an estuary the mouth or entrance of which from the Black Sea is very narrow, with the fort of Otchakov on the north shore and the fortress of Kinburn on a tongue or spit of land on the south.

By international law this estuary is part of the territory of Russia, which is the Sovereign of the country on either side.

Not part of sea into which they flow.

Geographically, an estuary formed by the influx of rivers cannot be treated as part of the sea into which it flows.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the Black Sea terminates at the mouth of the estuary, and that neither Nicholaieff nor Kherson can be treated as "arsenaux militaires maritimes" on the Black Sea.

Limits of Black Sea and Bosphorus.

The Straits of the Bosphorus are, in our opinion, perfectly distinct from the Black Sea, and Constantinople cannot be pretended to be included in the "arsenaux militaires maritimes" or the Black Sea, or subject to any of the limitations with regard to arsenals or vessels of war.

My Lord,

As to armistice extending to operation of blockades, &c.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th February instant, stating that he was directed to state to us that a question will arise at an early period of the conferences about to be opened at Paris, as to the extent to be given to the armistice to be concluded between the belligerents.

That Her Majesty's Government and that of the Emperor of the French are disposed to confine that armistice generally to the land operations of the belligerents, leaving the Maritime Powers at liberty to maintain, extend, or establish blockades by sea, and to prevent the intercourse of neutrals with Russian ports or the navigation of Russian vessels. That the two Governments are also disposed to give Russia some species of assurance that during the period of the armistice her coasts shall be exempt from actual attack; and the point on which your Lordship would be glad to have our opinion at our earliest convenience is whether there can be legally made any exception or limitation of belligerent rights in the naval hostilities that are still to be kept up, that is to say, whether the Governments of England and France can give to Russia more than a verbal and unofficial assurance that during the armistice by land the naval forces of the allies shall not attack the ports, towns, or territories of Russia.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

Allies may guarantee Russia against attacks by sea without granting a general armistice by sea.

That we are of opinion that there is no legal objection to the Governments of England and France formally stipulating with Russia that during the armistice by land the naval forces shall not attack her ports, towns, and territories.

At the same time we think it right to point out that care should be taken to make it fully understood that this engagement does not extend to a general armistice by sea, for during such an armistice each Power would have a right to do what it might do in peace.

No fresh blockades allowable in case of general armistice,

None of the Russian ports in the Baltic and White Sea being now blockaded, the imposition of any fresh blockade would be inconsistent with an armistice by sea, and the agreeing to any such armistice would, in our opinion, give great advantage to the enemy, whose merchant vessels would be at liberty to trade, and whose ships of war might move, while no corresponding advantage or security would be gained by the allies. A general armistice by sea would also be calculated to involve them with neutral Governments whose vessels might attempt to carry contraband of war to Russia, or to convey Russian troops or munitions of war coastwise.

which might occasion complications.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received February 23.)

Doctors' Commons, February 22, 1856.

My Lord,

Purchase of vessels by neutrals of belligerents.

Request of Swedish Minister for principles of British law.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Swedish and Norwegian Minister at this Court, requesting by direction of his Government to be furnished with exact information as to the principles of English law applicable to vessels purchased by the subjects of a neutral Power from the subjects of a belligerent; and to request that I would furnish your Lordship with a report upon this subject, so that your Lordship may be able to return an answer to Baron Hochschild's letter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as the Swedish Minister puts no specific questions, and refers to no particular case of difficulty or hardship in which any vessel under the Swedish flag has been involved in consequence of the principles applied by British Prize Courts to ships purchased by neutrals from the enemy, it does not appear to me to be easy, or even to be expedient, for your Lordship to "lay down such principles categorically," unless in answer to some categorical questions, more especially when it is notorious that Her Majesty's Government has no power or control whatsoever over the proceedings or decisions of Prize Courts, and that such proceedings are always public, and regularly reported in a very intelligible form, so that all persons interested therein may easily ascertain what are the principles therein applied to such transactions—transactions which, I may remark, have been unusually frequent during the present war, probably owing to the flag at present being permitted to cover the cargo, but in which ships have (as far as I am aware) been seized only in three instances under the Swedish flag:—

Swedish vessels before Prize Court.

1. The "Wester Norland," in which further proof was granted without opposition by the Crown, and upon such proof she was restored without opposition by the Crown.

2. The "Richard," not yet heard.

3. The "Christian Loven," which was before the Court of Admiralty on the 30th January last, and which may possibly have led to the present inquiry. In this case restitution was not even asked for by the Swedish claimant, who did not complain of the seizure, but only applied for permission to give further proof of the validity of the purchase, to which the Crown instantly consented; this case is still sub judice. It will thus be seen that only one Swedish case (of this class) has been decided, and that such decision was "restitution by consent."

Sales flagrante bello, are open to suspicion.

Prize Courts take common sense view, &c.

Subject to these remarks, I proceed to observe that, according to the principles applied by British Prize Courts, purchase of enemy's ships by neutrals flagrante aut imminente bello, although not (as in France) absolutely illegal and void, yet, from their nature are justly open to suspicion, and that, in permitting claimants to establish the validity of such purchases, the British Prize Courts act with vigilance, and adopt such rules as reason and common sense suggest to guard against fraud, collusion, and concealment of enemy's interest, and to ascertain that all such interest is absolutely and completely divested from the original owner, and has been bonâ fide and wholly transferred to the neutral claimant without any secret contract, trust, or reservation.

What evidence is admissible.

The burden of proof is (in a certain sense) cast upon the claimant, but the only evidence admitted by the Court is that furnished by the ship's papers and the claimant's evidence on depositions of master and crew, in the first instance, and by the further proof; neither the Crown nor the captor or seizor is as a general rule permitted to adduce any contradictory evidence whatsoever.

1853-56

Advantages to claimants.

The great advantage which the claimant derives from this peculiar course of procedure is obvious; no ship is condemned but by reason of their alleged owners' evidence (though uncontradicted) being false or defective, or of his having shown mala fides, and when further proof is allowed, the Crown is frequently obliged to disclose its whole case in the first instance, and the claimant, after having obtained "further proof," proceeds (forewarned and, therefore, forearmed) to answer the case of the Crown at his discretion by affidavits and documents which in practice cannot be contradicted. Anything tending to continue the enemy's interest in the vessel is held to vitiate such contracts altogether.

What circumstances vitiate a sale.

If, after and notwithstanding the alleged sale, the vessel be employed habitually in the enemy's trade or under the direction of an enemy, the sale will be held colourable and collusive; again, the spoliation or the improper concealment or suppression of papers, gross prevarication by the master and crew upon their examination; the attempt to set up a case which is contradicted by the evidence or by the ship's papers; or any conduct showing a want of good faith in the parties interested, will be followed by the same result, for Courts administering law of nations require good faith. It is not, however, absolutely necessary that the whole course and nature of the transaction should be at once apparent on the face of the papers or by the evidence of the master and crew. The claimant will generally be permitted to adduce further proof of the requisite facts, but he may also forfeit such right by misconduct of the description above alluded to.

"Further proof" allowed.

Commercial domicile fixes nationality.

It may not be superfluous to add that, as a general principle, persons are considered as belonging to the country of their actual or of their commercial domicile, independently of the country either of their birth or of their allegiance or adoption. Her Majesty's Government has, in my opinion, acted with remarkable leniency towards neutrals in this class of cases; indeed, short of conniving at Russian vessels resorting to its ports under the transparent disguise of any neutral flag, I do not see how less could have been done than has been actually done in this matter. There can be no doubt but that a large number of Russian vessels is at this moment sheltered under various neutral flags in fraud of Her Majesty's belligerent right, and greatly to the advantage of the enemy.

Generosity of Her Majesty's Government, and consequent fraud.

I believe that not above one or two (if any) vessels have been captured by Her Majesty's ships on this ground during the whole war. In all the other cases of the kind, about forty in number, the vessels have been seized by the officers of the Customs whilst lying in British ports into which they had come as if either courting inquiry or in defiance of Her Majesty's sovereign rights as a belligerent.

Thus it will be seen that both the principles and the practice adopted by the British Prize Courts and by Her Majesty's Government, with reference to this class of cases, have been liberal and most lenient towards neutral flags. In a very large proportion of such cases fraud and false swearing have been detected and exposed.

I do not at present see how a more categorical answer can well be given to the very general and sweeping inquiry of his Excellency the Swedish Minister.

Works of reference.

It would be easy to refer to the numerous reported cases upon this subject; but these must be either well known or easily accessible to the Swedish Legation. The clearest illustrations of the general principles which are applied by Prize Courts to these cases will be found in "Storey's Notes on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts," by Dr. Pratt, 1854, p. 25 and p. 63. The "Vigilantia," 1 C. Robinson, p. 1; the "Bernoro," 1 C. Robinson, p. 103; the "Secks Geshwistern," 4 C. Robinson, p. 101 (cases in former wars). The "Johann Christoph," 1 Spinks' Prize Cases, p. 60; the "Ernst Merck," 1 Spinks, p. 98; the "Soglasie," ibid., p. 104; the "Nina," printed Judgment inclosed (cases in the present war).

Judgment in case of the "Nina" annexed.

If I were fully aware, either of the real object of the Swedish Minister's application, or of the particular principle or class of cases upon which he desires information "in a categorical manner," I might be able to give your Lordship fuller and more definite information upon the subject.

Judgment delivered by Dr. Lushington, August 11, 1855.

Judgment.

IT is admitted on behalf of the claimant that he cannot ask for anything more than further proof, in order to clear away the difficulties which it is asserted, and, indeed, not denied on the part of any one, exist in this case.

Having read all the papers before I came into Court, and having attended to all the observations of Counsel on both sides, I think it wholly unnecessary to delay my decision, being perfectly satisfied that I should never alter my view of this case, though perhaps, if I occupied further time before I delivered my Judgment, I might make it a little more clear, or, perhaps, carry it to greater length, but I deem it unnecessary to do so under the present circumstances.

The claim is made on behalf of a person of the name of Gherdacovich, of Costrena, in Austria, and it was stated that originally it was the intention of Baron Rothschild to have made the claim as Consul-General for Austria, and so it appears upon the face of this claim. Now really that has nothing to do with the question which I am about to decide, for whether the claim is preferred by one individual or by another, the Court abides by its general rules and principles, without any regard to persons or individuals. No doubt it was exceedingly proper in this vessel's master to take the advice of the Consul-General of the State to which he claimed to be a subject, and, for aught I know, he might have applied also to the Ambassador; but even if that were the fact, it would not make on the mind of the Court even the very slightest impression, for I am neither to be influenced nor in the slightest degree governed by the opinion of any person nor by anything except what I deem to be the law of nations as administered in this Court.

Obstacles placed in the way of investigation.

If the master did make application to the Consul-General in due time, it was unfortunate that, from some cause or other, he did not receive that advice which would have enabled him, I trust, to have conducted himself with greater propriety than he has done towards the officer of the Customs. Instead of affording every facility for bringing in the papers and the examination of himself and his crew, he folded his arms, and, if not actively engaged in preventing the inspection of those papers, rendered no aid, and certainly prevented the examination of himself and of those on board; but I do not attribute that to the advice of his Consul; I should be exceedingly sorry so to do, because undoubtedly, if that was so, whether it emanated from Consular or any other authority, it would tend to indispose the Court from giving due consideration to persons filling those high offices.

Now what are the facts of this case? The ship was originally a British, then a Russian vessel, but, as represented, became Austrian in the year 1853, at what particular time is uncertain from these papers, in which, although the vessel was represented to be an Austrian vessel in the month of July 1853, yet she did not become so till the month of November in the same year.

Legality of bonâ fide sale.

Now at that period I have no hesitation in saying that if a Russian owner was desirous of changing her character by sale, it was competent for him so to do, and equally competent to the Austrian subject to buy it, provided only the transaction was fair and the Russian interest was divested, and the Austrian flag properly assumed under the authority of that country, that country not being deceived by any false representation, and the owner being entitled to a national Austrian character.

Divided ownership fatal to restoration.

Such being the facts in the case, the vessel has been claimed by Mr. Gherdacovich as the sole owner of the property, and the Court can decree restitution to this claimant on no other ground than that he himself is the person solely entitled to it. Even if the case should be made out by further proof, which appeared to me to be a little inadvertently suggested to the Court, namely, that he had the legal title in this property, but in reality other persons in conjunction with him were interested in the ship, be they who they may, unquestionably I could never restore on this claim. The Court will never restore on any claim unless it is satisfied that the property is bonâ fide the property of the individual who claims it, and if it finds any other interest lurking out in any shape, it is quite sufficient for me to pronounce against that claim.

There are two points, then, which arise for the consideration of the Court in this case, independently of the many questions and the many doctrines which have been ably discussed at the bar.

The first question is one that might be a matter for further proof, viz.:—Was Mr. Gherdacovich of Costrena or not? What do I find in the evidence? I find the master swearing in no very credible or satisfactory manner—First, that he had been resident at Costrena sixteen or seventeen years, and then afterwards adding he was resident at Odessa, but when and where he knew not, though it appears beyond all doubt and question that this Mr. Gherdacovich put him in possession of the ship in 1851, at Odessa. He might have had, I think, the means of giving us a little more satisfactory information of the residence of Mr. Gherdacovich at Odessa. But what do I find besides? Without entering minutely into the particulars of this case, I find Mr. Gherdacovich in 1854 resident at Odessa both in the month of April and also of November. Now these circumstances excite very great suspicion as to whether Mr. Gherdacovich is really entitled to be considered an Austrian subject, according to the sense in which the words must be understood in this Court. It does not follow, as seems to be imagined, that because this gentleman might have been born of Austrian parents, that he might have been resident at Costrena, and might have gone there occasionally or frequently (if he was carrying on trade and business at Odessa, if he was employed as the ship has been at Odessa), he would be entitled to come before the Court and claim restitution in an Austrian character. He must be bound by the character of that place where he was resident and carrying on his trade, and to which the transaction properly belongs. I mention this because at the commencement of the transaction, when Austrian colours were assumed, matters appear throughout the papers which are explained in a very unsatisfactory manner to the Court. It seems to have been thought by the parties that they were at liberty to change the national character of the vessel without the slightest regard to the reality of the transaction, on the mere representation that they wished to obtain, first, Austrian colours, and then any other that might suit the purposes of trade. If that be so—I do not say it is in the case of Austria, as I regret to say it has in other cases—the grant of the national flag has been made without a just regard to the rights of the belligerent.

1853-56

Now, supposing I got over that, what is the next point? I have already said I can restore to nobody, by possibility, but Mr. Gherdacovich, as sole owner. Now what is the state of the papers? I am told very cautiously, did Counsel abstain from stating the mode and manner in which they would effect their object? but they tell me (if I will but shut my eyes and open my ears) they will find the means of proving Mr. Gherdacovich to be the sole owner. Notwithstanding the documents under my eyes, they will find the means whereby in reading them I shall be enabled to put on them a construction totally and wholly incompatible with that sense which they bear upon the face of them.

Now, I ask, how is this to be done? I again refer to those words, which I read before in the course of the argument, "I know you would be pleased to proceed on your voyage to the Adriatic; I would consent to it, but you know well that I am not the sole owner, and must execute the orders of my partners."

Fictitious transfer from Russian flag.

Now, if it were to be proved by any evidence produced in the case that this gentleman was sole owner, it would, as the learned Queen's Advocate has said, be in direct contradiction to the construction which any man of common sense must put on the words to which I have referred. But does the case rest here? Not only would it be in direct defiance of that meaning, but in direct contradiction of the whole of the correspondence, because there are letters upon letters in which Signor Cossio is represented as having an interest in this vessel, in which Anatra, living at Odessa, is represented as having an interest in the vessel; and when I see that the construction I put on these words—and no man living can put another—is in direct accordance with all the other documentary evidence, can I, under these circumstances, allow further proof, the very object of which would be to falsify the whole of the papers? I am of opinion that upon this ground alone I must not allow further proof; but there are in this case a variety of other reasons which fortify my opinion, and which seem to demand from the Court that determination which I have now expressed. I will make every possible excuse for this man being a foreigner, every possible excuse for his not understanding what is meant by a suppression of papers, but it is clear that he, through an agent, was concealing papers from the seizors, and preventing them obtaining possession of the papers which by the law of nations this Court is entitled to require. Nor is this all, more unsatisfactory evidence the Court never had occasion to read. Can I believe this person was so ignorant of the ownership of this vessel that he could not have told me if the claim was such as it is represented to be—a sale or transfer in November 1853 to the present claimant—that he could not have given the Court some rational exposition of the subject. He who had been master from 1851, he who was appointed by the owners in 1851, there was that paper adverted to (No. 101), showing that in 1850 Cossio and Co. were owners, these are the words, "and Co.;" he must have known, what was obvious to every man of common sense, that this was a transfer—I do not say a culpable transfer, but a transfer for the purpose of getting rid of the Russian national character and taking the Austrian national character. He must have known who the Russian owners were who executed the conveyance, and he must have known something of the consideration which passed if it was an honest and just transaction.

I condemn this vessel, and I regret that in the first case of a vessel coming before this Court under the Austrian flag it is my duty to pronounce that sentence. I shall always be ready to give that flag as indulgent a consideration as the law of nations will permit; but, at the same time, I trust that the Austrian Government will take care not to allow its flag to be prostituted for the purpose of protecting the property of an enemy from the just rights of a belligerent.

I certify this to be substantially a correct report of the observation of Dr. Lushington on decreeing the condemnation of the ship.

Messrs. Powell's claim, and loss of business at Galatz.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th January ultimo, stating that, with reference to my Reports of the 1st June and 13th July, 1854,* he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Powell and Co., calling the attention of your Lordship to the loss they have sustained by the destruction of their ship "Bedlington," and by their being obliged to relinquish their commercial business at Galatz; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration with reference to the previous correspondence, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the mode of proceeding with respect to this matter in case of peace being concluded; and that I would inform your Lordship whether I wish to receive the further information offered by the applicants.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Parties must make claim for presentation to Russian Government in case of peace.

That I am of opinion that, in case of peace being concluded, the circumstances connected with the destruction of the "Bedlington" may properly be brought under the notice of the Russian Government, with a view to obtaining compensation for the amount of the actual value of the vessel and cargo at the time she was sunk. For this purpose, the parties interested should, in my opinion, be requested to furnish your Lordship with a full and accurate statement of the facts, including everything which may enable your Lordship to establish their claim for compensation against the Russian Government, and also with an account of the value at the time of the loss divided into separate general items, with vouchers or something equivalent thereto, (as thus—"Ship , tons , built at in 18 , valued at £ [builders' or surveyors' certificate]. Cargo, tons of , at £ per ton [invoices or papers]. Master's and men's clothes and effects: master's, £ ; men's, each, £ "), so as to enable your Lordship to determine what amount of compensation may fairly be demanded.

I beg to call attention to the newspaper extract (with these papers), containing a statement from Mr. William Phillips, master of the barque "Anne," of Shields, which appears to be very material, and which should be supplied by the owners of the "Bedlington" in an authentic shape.

With reference to the further claim, now first put forward by Messrs. Powell and Sons at the conclusion of their letter of the 30th January, 1856, I have to observe that this is a new and distinct case, not connected with that of the "Bedlington," and that I therefore abstain from any remarks thereon.

It appears that Messrs. F. and M. Anderson, the original applicants, were interested in the ship, and Messrs. Henry Powell and Sons in the cargo; there may possibly be other parties interested, and it might be convenient if one person or firm could be

My Lord,

Sale of belligerent ships to neutrals.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st March instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 22nd February ultimo,* upon the subject of the request of the Swedish and Norwegian Minister at this Court (dated February 14, 1856) to be furnished with precise information as to the principles of English law applicable to vessels purchased by the subjects of a neutral Power from the subjects of a belligerent, he was directed to transmit to me the draft of an answer, founded upon my above-mentioned Report, which your Lordship proposes to address to Baron Hochschild; and to request that I would take the draft of answer into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to whether it is right and proper.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the draft of answer into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am of opinion that the draft answer is right and proper.

Remarks on reply to Swedish Minister.

I beg, however, to submit to your Lordship's consideration the propriety of stating to his Excellency the Swedish Minister that only three ships under Swedish colours have, as far as I am aware, been seized during the present war on suspicion of being really Russian property.

1. The "Wester Norland," in which the claimant asked not for restitution but for permission to offer further proof, thus admitting the justice of the seizure; the Crown consented thereto, and the ship was subsequently restored, also by consent of the Crown.

2. The "Christian Loven," in which the claimant did not ask for restitution, but only for permission to give further proof, to which the Crown consented. After such consent had been given, the whole of the case upon which the Crown means to rely hereafter was (without my knowledge) disclosed to the claimant pendente lite (I presume through the Swedish Minister). This state of things appears to me to demonstrate the leniency with which Her Majesty's Government has acted in this matter, and also the entire absence of any real grievance whatsoever in relation thereto so far as regards Sweden.

3. The "Richard," which case is appointed to be heard on the 14th instant. I am not aware that any communication has been made thereon by the Swedish Government, or that it is a case of any peculiar hardship.

My Lord,

Case of the "Bedlington" sunk in the Danube.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 29th March ultimo, stating that, with reference to my report of the 29th Febuary last,† he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, the accompanying letters from Messrs. Powell and Sons, inclosing documents in support of the claims of the owners of the "Bedlington" and of her cargo, on account of the sinking of that vessel in March 1854 by Russian batteries on the Danube, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion whether the case is now in such a shape as will justify Her Majesty's Government in bringing it under the consideration of the Russian Government when peace shall be re-established, and whether the amount of compensation claimed by the parties interested is such as can properly be put forward.

* No. 376.

† No. 377.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Claim may be brought before Russian Government.

That I am of opinion that the case is now in such a shape as will justify Her Majesty's Government in bringing it under the consideration of the Russian Government when peace shall be re-established.

Compensation. As to settlement by arbitration.

With respect to the amount of compensation claimed by the parties interested, I would venture to suggest that such amount need not be stated to the Russian Government in the first instance. The amount actually claimed is not precisely such as in my opinion can be put forward by Her Majesty's Government, but such amount might in my opinion be conveniently settled by the arbitration of merchants or Consular Officers of some neutral or indifferent Power, in the event of the Russian Government admitting the justice of the claim in point of principle.

Items of claim.

Remarks.

Subject to these remarks, I beg to point out that the fourth item in Messrs. Powell's memorandum of 12th March, 1856, and the items in Messrs. Anderson's memorandum of 17th March, 1856, from the fourth to the ninth (both inclusive), do not appear to me to be such as can properly be insisted upon. The amount to be claimed from Russia should in my opinion be limited (1) to the value of the ship, (2) the insurance on her, (3) value of the cargo on board when sunk, (4) value of the net freight on the homeward voyage from Galatz, (5) personal effects of master and crew, (6) interest on the amount of value of ship and cargo and freight from the time when the voyage would probably have terminated up to the period of settlement.

I do not observe that any attention has been paid by the parties interested to the suggestion made in my previous report as to the statement of Mr. William Phillips, master of the barque "Ann" of Shields.

My Lord,

Messrs. Powell's claim for loss on breaking up establishment at Galatz.

Case of "Bedlington."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th March ultimo, stating that, with reference to the last sentence but one in my report of the 29th February last,* respecting the case of the "Bedlington," he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Henry Powell and Sons, inclosing a statement with documents respecting their claim on account of loss sustained by their being compelled to break up their establishment and leave their factory at Galatz, in consequence of the occupation of the Principalities by the Russians, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon, and whether Messrs. Powell's claim is one which Her Majesty's Government can properly bring before the Russian Government after the war is ended, with a view of obtaining compensation for the claimants.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's note of the 22nd March ultimo, forwarding a further document which has been received from Messrs. Powell and Sons, respecting the loss sustained by them in consequence of being compelled to break up their establishment at Galatz.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Inadmissible.

That the claim of Messrs. Powell does not appear to me to be one which Her Majesty's Government can properly bring before the Russian Government after the war is ended, with a view of obtaining compensation for them. Considered as a whole, it is, in my opinion, inadmissible, It is, of course, possible that they may be entitled to something, but many of the items in their "Memorandum of Loss" appear to me to be unreasonable, more especially the third, fourth, and last items, which are wholly destitute of vouchers, and amount (together) to half of the total claim. I may add that, if British merchants deliberately claim unreasonable compensation in such cases, it does not appear to me to be incumbent on Her Majesty's Government to sift and discuss each separate item. Her Majesty's Government may simply reply that "the claim is one which cannot properly be adopted or maintained internationally."

Her Majesty's Government need not support monstrous claims.

I observe, however, that Mr. Vice-Consul Cunningham is alluded to by Messrs. Powell as having advised and recommended their abandonment of their establishment at Galatz, and it may therefore appear to your Lordship advisable to apply to that gentleman for any remarks which he may have to offer upon the subject of Messrs. Powell's claim, more especially requesting his attention to their "Memorandum of Loss," and to the apparent absence of any formal or direct intervention on the part of the Russian authorities in Messrs. Powell's affairs, as by requisition, sequestration, forfeiture, destruction, or otherwise, and also to the fact that Messrs. Powell do not appear to have made any complaint or protest, or application for compensation or redress, either to Her Majesty's Vice-Consul, or to the Russian commanding officer, or to the local authorities at the time when they actually suffered their alleged losses.

I may add that I am not aware either of the date or circumstances of Messrs. Powell's first application to Her Majesty's Government in this matter, or of the date or circumstances of their leaving Galatz; nor do I understand whether they left any person in charge of their property and interests there, or whether the "buildings, fixtures, machinery, and plant" (the full value of which they claim), were wholly abandoned and left "derelict" on their departure.

The Law Officers of the Crown to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received April 22.)

My Lord,
Doctors' Commons, April 22, 1856.

Danish ships "Steen Bille" and "Magle" captured for breach of blockade.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th March ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a corresponnence which has passed between the Foreign Office and the Danish Minister, General Oxholm, relative to the Danish ships "Steen Bille" and "Magle," which were captured for breach of blockade and condemned as prizes by the Admiralty Court. Lord Wodehouse also transmits a letter from the Admiralty inclosing a Report from the Queen's Proctor in the cases of these two vessels.

Restitution claimed.

That General Oxholm applies for the restitution of the "Steen Bille" and "Magle" upon the ground that the cases of these vessels are analogous to those of the "Franciska" and "Union," which were released on appeal from the Privy Council. That the Queen's Proctor rests his opinion that the cases are not analogous upon the fact that the "Steen Bille" and "Magle" sailed for their destinations after the 15th May, the date at which he considers that the Privy Council decided that the blockade was legally established, whereas the "Franciska" and "Union" sailed before that day; but from the report of the Judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Franciska," it appears that the decision given in favour of that vessel was based rather upon the want of legal notice of the blockade than upon the date at which the blockade was legally established, special reference being made to a letter from Her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, dated 3rd June, 1854, as proving the invalidity of the notice, and it may be concluded, therefore, that the ground upon which General Oxholm rests the analogy which he seeks to establish is rather the impossibility of the "Steen Bille" and "Magle," which sailed on the 18th and 28th of May, having received a valid notice of the blockade for the breach of which they were captured and condemned.

As to want of legal notice of blockade.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to add that your Lordship would be disposed to recommend to the Treasury that compensation should be made for the condemnation of the "Steen Bille" and "Magle," without compelling the owners to incur the heavy expense of an appeal to the Privy Council, provided the analogy between their cases and those already decided should, on examination, appear to be sufficiently established, and provided no serious inconvenience would arise from the restitution of other vessels being likely to be claimed upon similar grounds. With this view, Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that we would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion whether the cases of the "Steen Bille" and "Magle" are analogous to those of the "Franciska" and "Union," or, if not, in what the distinction between these cases consists, in order that your Lordship may be able to point out that distinction to General Oxholm.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the "Franciska" has established the following conclusions with respect to the blockade of the Baltic:—

1. That it results from the Orders in Council of the 29th of March and 15th April, 1854, that there could be no legal blockade of any Russian port in the Baltic prior to the 15th May, 1854.

Judgment. As to validity of notice of blockade.

2. As no legal blockade was in existence prior to the 15th May, it follows there could be no notice of an existing blockade to affect a neutral ship on the 14th May, when the "Franciska" sailed from Elsinore.

If not de facto, not binding on neutrals.

3. That the notification of blockade published by the British Admiral and British authorities in April 1854 was a declaration of a general blockade extending to all the Russian ports in the Baltic and Gulfs of Finland and Bothnia, whereas in fact several ports were not blockaded until the 20th May, and others not until the 26th June, and that the notice of blockade therefore being more extensive than the fact, was not binding on neutrals, who, on the settled principles of law are not bound to attend to any notice of a blockade which is more extensive than the blockade itself.

Appeals might have succeeded at the time.

This last conclusion is the most important part of the Judgment, because it involves the restitution of all neutral ships which, on the ground of their attempted violation of the blockade, were captured prior to the 26th June, 1854. If therefore appeals had been presented in due time in the cases of the ships the "Steen Bille" and the "Magle," we think that the Privy Council would have ordered restitution; but the orders would have been founded solely on this objection to the validity of the notice of the blockade.

Condemnation now final.

No appeals, however, having been duly presented, the condemnation has become absolute and final, and the present application of the Danish Minister for compensation to the owners of those two vessels can hardly be entertained unless it be supported by consideration of equity and moral justice.

No grounds for favourable consideration.

But independently of the technical objection to the sufficiency of the notice of blockade, which is afforded by the Judgment of the Privy Council, it does not appear that there are any circumstances in the case of the "Steen Bille" and the "Magle" which should entitle the owners to favourable consideration.

Owners knew of blockade.

Both vessels cleared for the Baltic after the expiration of the time fixed by the Order in Council, and we are informed (though it does not appear in the papers before us) that it was clearly proved that the owners of the vessels had full knowledge of the existence of the blockade of the Gulf of Riga, and deliberately attempted to evade it.

We may also observe that in the "Steen Bille," although the ship's papers were made out as for Stockholm (to which port the master and those of the crew who were examined swore that she was destined), yet that a letter from the owner to the master containing the words "God with you and luck to Riga" was found on board, which the master refused to deliver, and attempted to destroy.

If restored, other claims will arise.

We think, therefore, that these cases (especially the "Steen Bille") are not entitled in foro conscientiæ to any indulgence; and it is obvious that if the present claim be allowed, very serious inconvenience will arise from similar claims in the case of all the vessels captured for breach of blockade prior to the 26th June, 1854.

"Bedlington" case.

May be submitted to Russian Government.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th May instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 17th ultimo,* he was directed to transmit to me a letter which your Lordship caused to be addressed to Messrs. Powell respecting the case of the "Bedlington," together with a further letter from Messrs. Powell; and to request that I would communicate to your Lordship any observations which I may have to make on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

That I have no further observations to make on these additional papers.

The case may now be brought to the notice of the Russian Government in whatever manner your Lordship may consider most advisable.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received June 12.)

Doctors' Commons, June 11, 1856.

My Lord,

Destruction of British vessel "Howard" at Sinope in 1853.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th May ultimo, stating that, with reference to my report of the 3rd April, 1854,* he was directed to transmit to me a further letter from the parties interested in the case of the "Howard," and to request that I would state to your Lordship whether I am of opinion that the facts of the case are such as to justify Her Majesty's Government in calling upon the Government of Russia for compensation for the owners of the "Howard."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report—

Cannot support formally.

That the facts of the case are not in my opinion such as to justify Her Majesty's Government in calling upon the Government of Russia for compensation for the owners of the "Howard."

Owners were aware of danger.

Not deliberately destroyed by Russians.

The owners were aware of the war between Turkey and Russia, and the "Howard" was lying in a midst of a fleet of Turkish ships of war at Sinope within two or three days' sail of Sebastopol, in which port a superior Russian force was known to be ready for sea. I cannot discover what particular precautions she took in anticipation of an attack, to the consequence of which she was obviously exposed. This attack was suddenly made, and she was (after being struck by several Russian shot and shell) burnt by a Turkish frigate on fire drifting foul of her. It is not alleged that she was deliberately or designedly fired at by the Russians; her colours were hoisted, but there was neither time nor means to remove her or to take any other step whatever. Her master and crew lost everything, and suffered much, and ran the most imminent risk of their lives.

The case is a very hard one, and if the Government of Russia should be inclined to consider it liberally it would greatly redound to their credit, but no formal demand can be made upon it; but if your Lordship should think fit to offer the applicants to instruct Lord Wodehouse to recommend the case as one which has attracted much notice in England, and of which Her Majesty's Government thinks favourable, to the consideration of the Russian Government, I see no objection thereto.

From the tone of the applications, however, I fear that such a course will not content them; and if they reject any offer to this effect, I do not see how your Lordship can take any step in the matter.

The Queen's Advocate to the Earl of Clarendon.—(Received July 4.)

Doctors' Commons, July 3, 1856.

My Lord,

"Howard" destroyed at Sinope in 1853.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 25th June ultimo, stating that, with reference to my report of the 11th June ultimo,† on the case of the "Howard," he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Colonel Treestun, inclosing a letter, together with a declaration from the owners of the "Howard," of the particulars respecting the destruction of that vessel by the Russians at Sinope in 1853; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship whether there is anything therein stated to induce me to alter the opinion expressed in my report of the 11th June ultimo.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Cannot formally claim compensation.

That I adhere to the opinion that I have already expressed in this case, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government cannot properly make any formal demand upon that of Russia for compensation for the owners of the "Howard." Anything short of this, and consistent with the national dignity, may in my opinion be done in favour of the claimants.

May support claimants.

The statement headed "Declaration made by the owners, &c." contains a succinct statement of the principal facts on which a representation to the Government of Russia may be based. I need scarcely suggest that it should be so framed as to avoid compromising Her Majesty's Government, and to admit of a negative answer without offence. No question of abstract right is involved, but it is a case strongly deserving of sympathy.

† No. 383.

Sinope unfortified; favourable to claim.

The most favourable circumstances appear to me to be the fact that Sinope was not a fortified arsenal; that no Turkish ships of war were there when the "Howard" arrived; that she made diligent preparations to get away after the Turkish fleet arrived; and that the extreme suddenness and rigour of the Russian attack rendered her escape impossible. She had been in Austrian (and not in Turkish) employment of a perfectly innocent kind previously; she was actually in ballast, and her destruction was apparently the result of the excitement and confusion of the attack, and must naturally be a subject of regret to the Government of Russia.

Her Majesty's Government, in abstaining from making any formal demand in a case which is ruinous to the individual sufferers, and which has attracted much public notice in England, will in my opinion give the best proof of its desire not to raise a painful discussion, and of its reliance on the liberality and good feeling of the Russian Government. Few acts of that Government would have a more graceful or conciliatory effect, especially upon the feelings of the maritime and commercial classes of this country, than the reimbursing the owners and crew of the "Howard" for their losses.

Mexico.

Robbery of bondholders' funds at British Legation. Liability of Her Majesty's Government.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 21st December ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying representations from the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Mexican bondholders, relative to the recent robbery by the authorities at Mexico of the funds belonging to the British holders of those bonds, which were deposited, under lock and key, in the house of Her Majesty's Legation in that city.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to transmit to me a copy of the answer which, by your Lordship's direction, he returned to those gentlemen.

Mr. Hammond was further pleased to inclose despatches from Mr. Mathew, explanatory of the circumstances under which the funds of the bondholders were deposited in the house of Her Majesty's Legation; and also showing why advantage was not taken by the bondholders' agent of the departure of a "conducta" to the coast to remit the bondholders' property to them.

Mr. Hammond was also further pleased to inclose the Draft of the instructions under which Mr. Mathew has lately broken off relations with General Miramon's Government, and has retired to Jalapa, together with Mr. Mathew's reply.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship such observations as I may have to offer thereupon, not only as regards the course to be pursued in Mexico, but also as regards the claim attempted to be set up on behalf of the bondholders against Her Majesty's Government, as being liable, under certain contingencies, to make good their loss.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That "the course to be pursued in Mexico" is so entirely a question of policy, that, not being in possession of any intimation of the opinions or views of Her Majesty's Government on this question, I cannot presume to offer any advice.

I can only observe, that Her Majesty's Government appears to have persisted in recognizing General Miramon as the only legal President, or Chief of the Republic, until Mr. Mathew, pursuant to your Lordship's instructions, broke off diplomatic relations with that General in October last, and retired to Jalapa. Señor Juarez has long been, and still is, engaged in a civil war against General Miramon, and is in possession of part of the territory of the Republic, including Vera Cruz; but he does not seem to be recognized by Her Majesty's Government as having any legitimate or rightful political authority in Mexico.

Her Majesty's Government now desires to keep aloof from both parties, and it apparently considers that there is not in the Republic of Mexico any Government or Chief who can fairly be considered as entitled to recognition, as such, by foreign nations.

1861

I cannot, under such circumstances, see how Her Majesty's Government, unless prepared to use force, can take any practical steps to obtain redress for the injury in question.

General Miramon has added this last outrage to others, which had previously caused a diplomatic rupture with him; and Señor Juarez (who is not much more scrupulous) cannot, even if recognized, be made answerable for General Miramon's acts of violence.

On Mr. Mathew's withdrawing to Jalapa, and breaking off all intercourse with General Miramon, he seems to have left Don Rafael Beraza in Mexico. This person had been a courier in the service of the Legation. I am not aware whether the Legation was occupied by him, or in what capacity he acted, or whether it was left wholly unoccupied; whether it is the absolute property of Her Majesty's Government, or is only a house or suite of apartments hired for a time; whether Her Majesty's arms were still displayed, with the words "British Legation;" or, in fact, what arrangements of this character were actually existing when the seizure in question took place.

With respect to the deposit of the funds in question at the Legation, it would seem as if in April last Mr. Mathew had sanctioned the placing in the Legation, by Mr. Whitehead (the agent of the British bondholders), of the funds then in that gentleman's custody for the greater security of those funds. If anything passed in writing on this subject between Mr. Whitehead and Mr. Mathew, the papers are not forthcoming: nor can I discover what precautions Mr. Whitehead suggested, or Mr. Mathew took, for the safety of these funds when he broke off diplomatic relations, and withdrew from Mexico in October.

I do not understand why the funds were not then placed in one of the Foreign Legations, or in the British Consulate; nor can I discover what was, in fact, done for their safe keeping on Mr. Mathew's retirement, although I presume that they were not left in an empty house or separate building, and in no person's actual possession or custody. I should not have clearly understood from Mr. Whitehead's letter to Mr. Robertson of the 17th November, that the money was actually taken out of the interior of the British Legation, which does not seem to have been entered by the soldiers or workmen employed. I should have inferred from this letter that the money was in a detached room or building, and not in the Legation. These particulars must be fully supplied, and a sketch or plan must be added if requisite.

The gross wrong committed by the forcible seizure of the money in question is apparent; but the precise extent and character of this seizure, in an international point of view, must in some degree depend on the explanation which may be furnished of the facts above adverted to, upon which Mr. Mathew and Mr. Glennie must be perfectly well informed.

The expediency of placing any money which still may remain unappropriated by General Miramon, in the safest place of custody which Mr. Whitehead can suggest (probably in one of the remaining Foreign Legations), and possibly also of placing all British subjects and property in Mexico under the temporary protection of one of those Legations, will naturally have suggested themselves to your Lordship. At present British subjects and property are wholly unprotected, and each party in turn, emboldened by impunity, wrongs them at its arbitrary discretion.

With respect to any claim on the part of the bondholders upon Her Majesty's Government to make good their loss, I can only say that I can see no ground upon which any such claim can be founded.

Mr. Whitehead apparently selected Her Majesty's Legation as the safest place of deposit. Mr. Mathew did not advise or suggest the placing the funds there; he merely assented to Mr. Whitehead's application, in order to secure the bondholders' property as far as practicable. Mr. Whitehead had, I presume, due notice of Mr. Mathew's approaching departure. Mr. Mathew left the funds locked up and under seal; and it does not appear that Mr. Whitehead objected to this arrangement, or suggested any further precaution on the withdrawal of Mr. Mathew: the inability of Her Majesty's Government to obtain redress from General Miramon cannot make it liable for the consequences of his violence.

Adverting, however, to the conclusion of Mr. McGarel's letter of the 14th December, I would suggest that it will be expedient to be very cautious in the wording of any official correspondence with him or with Mr. Robertson.

I have, &c.

My Lord,

Costa Rica.

Seizure of lumber at Punta Arenas.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 20th of December ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul in Costa Rica, reporting the particulars of a claim preferred against the Government of that State, on account of a quantity of lumber, belonging partly to a house in Glasgow, and partly to General Cañas, which was seized by the party of General Mora during the late insurrectionary movement at Punta Arenas, and was taken possession of by the Government troops at the time the insurrection was put down.

In order to my better understanding of this case, Mr. Hammond was pleased to observe that General Mora, who had for nine years held the office of President of Costa Rica, was removed from that office in August of last year, by means of a successful revolution headed by Dr. Montealegre, who on the flight of Mora was regularly installed as President. General Mora fled to the United States, but he did not abandon the hope of regaining his position in Costa Rica; and the movement at Punta Arenas in September last, which was concerted between Mora and his friends in the Republic, was made with a view to the restoration of himself and his party to power. The attempt was unsuccessful, and Generals Mora and Cañas (the latter of whom is stated to have been interested in the property which forms the subject of this reference) have since been shot.

The question for consideration is, as to how far Her Majesty's Government would be borne out in supporting this and any other claims of a similar character, in which British subjects or interests are concerned, arising out of the disturbances at Punta Arenas; and Mr. Hammond was accordingly pleased to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion upon this point.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have the honour to report, that the facts of the case are left in such obscurity by the Consul that I can offer no very confident opinion. It does not appear whether the "Glasgow house" (not named) has made any claim; whether this house was in partnership with General Cañas (who was shot as a rebel after an unsuccessful insurrection); or how he and the "house" were both interested in the same "lumber."

Assuming, however, that certain "lumber" still exists in specie, and can be identified as the sole property of British subjects, taken from them by rebels, and re-captured from those rebels by the forces of the Government, I should advise a claim being made by the Consul for its restitution; but the Consul should report fully on the case, and should state the value, and explain whether the owners have claimed and identified their property, separately from any interest of General Cañas therein.

With respect to other cases of the same character, it is impossible, upon so vague a statement, to lay down a general rule upon which the Consul can safely act; the circumstances of each claim, more especially when British subjects are not the sole owners of the property, must be fully explained and considered before any claim can be supported.

I have, &c.

Messrs. Yuille and Shortridge's claim.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th December ultimo, stating that with reference to our report of the 23rd April last, he was directed to transmit to us the draft of an instruction which your Lordship has addressed to Sir Arthur Magenis, Her Majesty's Minister in Portugal, regarding the proposed arbitration in the case of Messrs. Yuille and Shortridge's claim upon the Portuguese Government, together with a despatch from Sir A. Magenis transmitting the draft of a Memorandum proposed to be adopted by Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal, embodying the terms in which the case is to be referred to arbitration.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that the terms of this Memorandum are the same, mutatis mutandis, as those of a similar Memorandum agreed to by the two Governments when the case of Mr. Croft was referred by them to the arbitration of the Senate of Hamburgh: but before taking any further steps in this matter, your Lordship would be glad to learn our opinion whether there is any objection to Her Majesty's Government concurring in it.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions, we have taken this subject into consideration and have the honour to report—

That we see no objection to Her Majesty's Government concurring in the identic Memorandum, provided the terms of the submission to arbitration are approved of by Messrs. Yuille and Shortridge, to whom we recommend, for the sake of preventing future dispute, the draft should be communicated.

BRAZIL.

Refusal of Consul Cowper to respect decision of Court of Chancery. Mrs. Griffith's claim.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 31st of December last, in which he stated that he was directed by you to transmit to us a correspondence which had taken place between Mr. Sismez, a solicitor, Mr. Cowper, Her Majesty's Consul at Pernambuco, and the Foreign Office, in regard to the refusal of Mr. Cowper to obey an order of the Court of Chancery, desiring him to pay a certain yearly sum to a Mrs. Emma Griffiths; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take the papers into consideration and report to your Lordship whether you are called upon to take any, and if so what, steps in the matter, with a view to compel Her Majesty's Consul to obey the order of the Court.

In compliance with the request contained in Mr. Hammond's letter, we have taken the papers submitted to us into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Decree of the Court of Chancery, by which Mr. Cowper is ordered to pay to the plaintiff Mrs. Griffiths an annuity of 100*l.* and the sum of 450*l.* as the arrears of that annuity is in every respect formal and regular. Mr. Cowper appeared by Counsel, and defended the suit, and the Court appears to have had no doubt as to the Decree that ought to be made. Mr. Cowper does not intimate any intention of appealing from the Decree, but he avows his determination never to pay Mrs. Griffiths one farthing, and he requests your Lordship to leave the case to the ordinary operation of the law. Mr. Cowper knows that, as against him (resident in Pernambuco), the law is inoperative, and that the Court is baffled by his residence out of the jurisdiction.

If the salary received by Mr. Cowper from the Crown were income arising from real or personal property in this country, such income might be "attached," and made available to answer the Decree.

It is an indecent thing that any servant of the Crown should, by means of his official residence abroad, exempt himself from the jurisdiction of the Crown's Courts of Justice. For the purposes of justice he ought to be considered as resident in this country.

We advise, therefore, that Mr. Cowper be informed that unless he makes a satisfactory arrangement with the plaintiff within three months after the receipt of this notice, your Lordship must take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the justice of the Crown from being defeated by one of its servants.

We have, &c.

VENEZUELA.

Claim of the Daly family.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Mr. Orme, reporting his further communications with the Venezuelan Government regarding Mr. Daly's claim, and also a letter which has been received from Mr. Daly on this subject by the last mail.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose the previous correspondence in this case, as enumerated in the inclosed list, and to request that I would take the whole of these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether any or what further steps in this matter are called for, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, in the present state of things.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report, that it appears to me that some further and more decisive steps are called for on the part of Her Majesty's Government in the present state of things. What those steps should be, it is for Her Majesty's Government to determine; but they should be such as will compel the immediate payment in cash, with interest at 9 per cent., of the sum admitted to be due from Venezuela to the heirs of Mr. Daly, and so long and unjustifiably withheld from them.

Mr. Orme was instructed in No. 18, of March 3, 1860, to insist on prompt payment in cash of 57,113 dollars 78 cents, with interest at 9 per cent. Of this demand of Her Majesty's Government the Venezuelan Government appears to take no notice whatever; up to this time it has not only not paid that sum or any portion of it, except a trifling advance for the immediate wants of the Daly family, but it now states its determination "to submit to the Tribunals" a question of law and fact as to 14,015 dollars 38 cents, advanced to Mr. Daly in 1848 for payment of the fleet.

It gravely proposes to pay the sum demanded in ten quarterly payments, beginning in March 1861, to which arrangement Mr. B. Daly, who is said to represent the family, is alleged by Mr. Orme to consent. I cannot, however, see how such consent is consistent with his letter of December 6, 1860. If he does consent, of course Her Majesty's Government can have no adequate motive to insist on better terms; but inasmuch as it appears from his letter of December 6, that the Daly children will be unable litigate the question as to the 14,015 dollars 18 cents with the Venezuelan Government upon fair terms, or indeed at all, the practical result will be that, if matters remain as they are, the Venezuelan Government will ultimately succeed in carrying out with success the policy in which it has so long persisted.

If the Venezuelan Government is about to begin a litigation as to the sum of 14,015 dollars 18 cents (as it has announced), it should at least be made to feel some inconvenience as to the payment of the whole claim as admitted by it. If it will forego this contemplated litigation, and if the Daly children acquiesce, then, and then only, the payment by instalments, as suggested, may be accepted by Her Majesty's Government; but a merely "promised" payment by instalments of the sum demanded by Her Majesty's Government promptly and in cash, accompanied by a threat of litigation as to a portion of it, is, in my opinion, a flagrant evasion of the obligations of Venezuela, and such a settlement as Her Majesty's Government cannot accept as satisfactory.

---

* See further Report, page 58.

1861

I must observe that the able opinion of Dr. Caceres, dated October 23, 1860, No. 6 in Mr. Orme's No. 101 (which appears to me to dispose altogether of the case of the Venezuelan Government, so far as it relates to the 14,015 dollars 18 cents), is apparently an answer to a note from the Finance Minister to the Foreign Minister of the 27th of September, 1860, which note I cannot find with the papers.

Upon the whole I can see nothing in the additional papers to alter the aspect of the case; the Venezuelan Government is, as a matter of course, determined to resort to every species of procrastination and evasion, and to ignore or to trifle with the formal demand of Her Majesty to the utmost. Mr. Orme appears to consider the financial difficulties of that Government as a sufficient answer or excuse on its part, but if Her Majesty's Government chooses to insist upon and to compel prompt payment in cash I presume that it can do so, and I think that it ought to do so.

Mr. Whitehead's claim for injuries inflicted by Chilian troops.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 15, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th January instant, stating that, with reference to my reports of the 30th August, 1859, and the 5th and 26th April, 1860, on the subject of Mr. Whitehead's claim for compensation for injuries inflicted on him by Chilian troops, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Santiago, inclosing a further note from the Chilian Government regarding this claim, and to request that I would take this despatch into consideration, together with the former papers, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be sent to Mr. Thomson with reference to this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That the additional papers now transmitted tend to confirm and strengthen the opinion which I have already expressed upon this case in my previous reports.

The Chilian Government, far from punishing or even disavowing and regretting the conduct of its soldiers, entirely justifies and approves of their conduct; it affects to treat Mr. Whitehead as a "criminal," and seriously maintains that the soldiers in deliberately shooting him as he was running away in broad daylight, in a crowded street, where no conflict existed, and in subsequently following him into his club, and there robbing him and endeavouring to murder him, were only doing their strict duty.

I am of opinion that in this state of things, the prompt payment of an ample compensation by the Chilian Government to Mr. Whitehead, should be peremptorily insisted on. There has already been a considerable delay, and the Chilian Government has persisted from first to last in refusing to make any concession whatever, even in words.

The precise nature of the instructions to be sent to Mr. Thomson is a question for your Lordship; they should be such as to convince the Chilian Government that British subjects are not at the mercy of its undisciplined and savage troops, and as will most promptly and effectually tend to secure the payment of adequate compensation to Mr. Whitehead.

The ground taken by the Chilian Government appears to me to deprive it of any claim to lenity or consideration; had it punished the soldiers, and apologized for their misconduct, the aspect of the case might have been very different from what it is; but the Government has actually identified itself with the savage and wanton cruelty of its troops in all its details, and I trust that for the sake of the safety of all Her Majesty's subjects resident in Chile, it will be made seriously to feel the consequences of so doing.

Complaint of Mr. Stoker, on behalf of Count Brzezanski, against Mr. Legal Vice-Consul Wroth.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 15, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd December ultimo, stating that with reference to our Report of the 5th November, he was directed to transmit to us, for any observations which we may wish to make thereupon, a despatch from Mr. Hornby, inclosing Mr. Legal Vice-Consul Wroth's explanation in regard to the complaint of Mr. Stoker, acting on behalf of a person calling himself the Count Brzezanski.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions, we have the honour to report,—

That Vice-Consul Wroth's explanation only leaves the matter where it was. It is apparent that he had no doubt whatever of M. Brzezanski's identity; whether this gentleman rightly called himself "Count" or not, was not a question with which the Vice-Consul was concerned. He had no ground for suspecting any fraud, and he should not have made any difficulty.

Whether the circular (which is not with the papers) does or not "in terms meet the present case," all Consular officers should act in accordance with its general spirit and intention, and should beware of interposing any obstacle or delay when persons desire to make affidavits which are to be made use of before any British tribunal, or for any legal purpose in the Queen's dominions.

Surrender of an American deserter to a Prussian ship of war as a deserter from the Prussian service.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 16, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th January instant, stating that he was directed to forward the accompanying letter from the Colonial Office, inclosing a correspondence which has passed between Her Majesty's Colonial authorities at Hong Kong, and the Prussian and American Consuls in that island, upon the subject of a seaman who had deserted from an American vessel, and had given himself up to the captain of a Prussian ship of war as a deserter from the Prussian service.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that, in forwarding the above letter for our consideration and opinion, he was directed to inform us, with reference to the refusal of the Commander of the Prussian vessel to deliver the man up to the Colonial authorities, that the Convention between Great Britain and Prussia, for the mutual extradition of seamen deserters, applies only to the deserters from the merchant-service of the two countries.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report:—

That, assuming the "Elbe" to be a Prussian Government vessel, the deserter in question is not, nor has he been since he deserted, on British territory, and he was not within the power of British Municipal authority while on board the "Elbe."

The proper course for the United States to adopt is, to apply to the Prussian Government. There is no power of intervention on the part of this country.

Claim of the "Azorian" for unjustifiable performance of quarantine.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 17, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th of January instant, stating that, with reference to my reports of the 16th of April, 18th of June, 8th of August, and 31st of October, 1860, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid, setting forth the grounds on which the Spanish Government have declined to entertain the claim for compensation which has been advanced on behalf of the "Azorian;" and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this paper into consideration, together with the previous correspondence, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course now to be taken by Her Majesty's Government in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That I can only suggest that, before finally determining on the course to be taken by Her Majesty's Government in this matter, a last effort should be made to extract some substantial explanation or answer from the Spanish Government.

I cannot precisely ascertain what arguments have been directly addressed by Her Majesty's Government to that of Spain in this case, other than those contained in Sir A. Buchanan's note to the Duke of Tetuan, December 6, 1860 (Inclosure No. 1 in No. 434), which, I presume, must be viewed as containing the "British case." Nor am I aware what is to be considered as the Spanish answer, unless the note of the Duke of Tetuan of December 13th is to be so considered in substance. If this is, in effect, the only answer of the Spanish Government to the remonstrances and demands of Her Majesty's Government, such answer amounts only to this, namely, "the conduct of the Board of Health at Santa Cruz having been technically legal, according to the law then in force, compensation is refused." This is merely a repetition of the answer already given by Señor Collantes to Mr. Edwardes, July 2, 1860, according to a somewhat uncourteous Spanish practice, and it is, in effect, no answer at all.

The prominent facts and arguments which Her Majesty's Government is in a position to adduce will be found noticed in my previous reports, and in Mr. Murray's No. 36 and inclosures, 16th of September, 1859, especially in his despatch to the Board of Health at Santa Cruz of September 7, 1859. These facts and arguments may, therefore, perhaps be recapitulated, or embodied in an ultimatum, for which Sir A. Buchanan has by his recent correspondence adroitly kept the case still open. I need not recapitulate these facts and arguments.

The fact of the "Azorian" (alone) being treated in this unjust manner, without any boná fide reason, and whilst free communication was taking place between London and all parts of Spain, by land and sea, is so unreasonable, and primá facie indefensible, that the mere assertion of the technical legal power of the Board of Health to do as it did will not satisfy the British Government.

The Spanish law may have rendered possible the most unreasonable and oppressive conduct on the part of the authorities, but if this conduct was wholly unjustifiable on the merits, contrary to reason and national equity, and not resorted to in other cases of precisely the same class constantly recurring, its Spanish legality will not avail, per se, internationally in foro gentium.

First of all, and apart from the technicalities, how can Spain pretend, as a civilized Power, to justify the sending a vessel arriving from London at Teneriffe with a clean bill of health, and without having had any case or symptom of disease on board during the voyage, to Vigo to perform quarantine?

Spain does not pretend that this was necessary to prevent infection, or that it was done in every (or any) other case. In quarantine laws "cessante ratione, cessat lex." If it was confessedly ridiculous thus to treat the "Azorian" on any boná fide sanitary ground, the mere letter of the law (which is not admitted to be clear) is no sufficient answer.

Secondly. How can Spain take advantage of her own wrong if the case turns (as it would seem) in any degree on any defect of the bill of health drawn and issued by the Spanish Consul? (See the Board of Health to Consul Murray, September 7, 1859.) Article 40 of the then Spanish Sanatory Law (inclosure in Consul Murray's No. 36) declares, in effect, that if cholera had ceased for ten days no quarantine could be enforced. If the Consul did not certify this, it was his fault.

Thirdly. If the strict legality of the treatment of the vessel according to the Spanish health regulations turns only on this (which seems to me to be the case), that the Spanish Government had neglected to provide ports of quarantine of observation (as distinguished from ordinary lazarettos), then the Spanish Government is responsible for the consequences which are contended by it to have resulted from this flagrant omission just as much as it would be if it omitted to provide Custom-houses for the technical entry of goods and then detained foreign vessels for want of them, or sent such vessels to extravagantly distant ports.

Moreover, it would seem that, notwithstanding the omission of the Government, a system "quarantine of observation" on the spot was practically resorted to in all, or almost all, other cases at that time, and that the treatment of the "Azorian" was exceptional, and not such as was applied indiscriminately, and upon system (under colour of law), to all vessels in her position, which disposes of any boná fide sanitary justification by Spain.

Seeing that other acts of arbitrary and unjustifiable oppression in the matter of quarantine have been committed by Spain, and above all bearing in mind that the Spanish Government does not give any assurance against their recurrence, but, on the contrary, that the recent alteration of her sanitary laws has rendered them even more intolerable than before (see conclusion of Señor Argulle's legal opinion), it is obvious that if she persists in committing and defending such acts the whole British trade with Spain is, in effect, at the mercy of each Board of Health, and without any real security or protection whatsoever. The facts of this case speak for themselves, and afford a glaring instance of the intolerable position assumed by Spain in this matter; and the course to be taken by Her Majesty's Government will, I trust, be guided by these considerations.

Sardinia and Sicily.

Blockade of Gaeta by Sardinia on withdrawal of French squadron.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, January 21, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th January instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch from Earl Cowley, respecting a communication which has been made to his Excellency by the French Government, with reference to the possible blockade of Gaeta by Sardinia, after the withdrawal of the French squadron, and expressing a desire to be made acquainted with the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on certain points of international law which are raised in an article published in the newspaper "L'Ami de la Religion," a copy of which was inclosed.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion on the points in question, as well as on any others which may occur to me with reference to this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the first point which occurs to me is the extraordinary form and character of M. Thouvenel's communication to Earl Cowley.

M. Thouvenel, without in any manner indicating the views of the French Government, or the nature of its legal or international doubts or objections as to the contingency of the blockade of Gaeta by Sardinia, invites Earl Cowley's attention to an article on the subject in a French religious newspaper ("L'Ami de la Religion"), written by an advocate (M. Delaville), holding no public office, and not, as far as I am aware, of any European celebrity as a writer on international law; and in effect, as I understand Lord Cowley, M. Thouvenel, without further preface, requests to be made acquainted with the opinion of Her Majesty's Government upon this article.

If this was not M. Thouvenel's meaning, then I confess I know not on what document, or on what question of international law it is that M. Thouvenel really desires to know the opinion of Her Majesty's Government.

I have as yet, during nine years' tenure of my office, seen no instance of this very peculiar mode of raising or opening any serious question of international law, or of giving to a great Power any confidential intimation of opinion on a grave international question. I can only most respectfully advise your Lordship not to suffer Her Majesty's Government to be drawn into any international discussion upon the principles of blockade by this reference to M. Delaville's newspaper article.

Subject to these remarks, I proceed to consider the substance of this article; observing, at the same time, that M. Thouvenel expressed no opinion as to whether any or what portion of it was legally sound, or was or was not consonant with the views of the French Government. M. Delaville, as may be expected in a newspaper article, does not distinctly state, and support by authority, any positive or definite propositions or principles: he rather he suggests several doubts and difficulties which may interfere with the validity or the recognition of the anticipated blockade; but M. Delaville's arguments or suggestions (such as they are) when closely analysed appear to resolve themselves into the following:—

> "Hints a fault, and hesitates dislike;"

1. "A de facto effective blockade will be impracticable." He glances at the position of Messina and the Abruzzi, which do not enter into the question at present. This is a simple question of fact. If the blockade is not effective, cadit questio. I would observe on this, that the effective blockade of Gaeta is, in my opinion, very easy, and may be rigorously maintained by a small steam force, more especially as the King of Naples has no naval force at his command.

2. M. Delaville suggests that, even if actually imposed and maintained effectively de facto, it will not be recognized by other nations, more especially by the United States of America. He alludes to a note of Mr. Marcy to the European Powers, of which he does not give the date,* and to which I have no means of referring; but I have yet to learn that the United States have ever denied the existing right of blockade, which, in the case of Mexico, and in other cases, they have notoriously and recently enforced. There is probably some misconception on M. Delaville's part on this subject. However this may be, I can see no sufficient reason internationally why, assuming the blockade to be effective, any Power should refuse to recognize it. When a state of hostility notoriously exists either between two de facto Governments, or even between one portion and another portion of the subjects or citizens of the same Government, all other nations may, and generally do, remain bonâ fide neutral between the contending Parties; they treat each Government or party as a de facto Government, and recognize the blockades imposed by either. Numerous instances of this usage have occurred in modern times, more especially in South America. There can be no doubt but that the King of Sardinia is a Sovereign, not only de facto, but de jure. The extent of his territory, or his title to any part of it, is not directly in question; if he should blockade Gaeta, I cannot see why other nations should refuse to recognise the validity of such blockade. Neither the formal announcement of the blockade, nor the formal recognition thereof by the official publication of such announcement by other nations, is legally essential to the validity of the blockade itself. If it exists de facto, vessels may and will be captured for knowingly endeavouring to violate it: they will be lawfully captured primâ facie, and it will be for the Governments to which these vessels belong to show why they ought to be restored. The use of public notification is only to affect all persons with knowledge of the fact of the blockade.

M. Delaville next suggests that, inasmuch as there has been no formal declaration of war by the King of Sardinia against the King of Naples, the war is not "légitime et publique," and that the blockade will consequently be null and void ab initio. This position, although maintained by some writers, cannot be admitted: on the contrary, it is clear that war may legally exist without any official declaration of war. (See Bynkershock's lucid 2nd chapter, Quæst. J. P., entitled "Ut bellum sit legitimum, indictionem belli non videri necessariam.") Vattel says, "Le droit des gens n'impose point l'obligation de déclarer la guerre," &c. (Liv. iii, cap. 4, sec. 60.) And there are numerous modern instances of war without a declaration; such as the war ot 1688, when Louis XIV of France besieged and captured fortresses before his declaration of war; the war of the Spanish Succession, carried on for many weeks before any declaration of war. The war between Great Britain and France in 1754 was not preceded by a declaration, nor was that between those Powers in 1792; nor that between Great Britain and the United States of 1812. Even Ortolan, who is in favour of the necessity of a declaration of war, admits that, in point of fact, "la déclaration préalable de l'état de guerre est souvent omise par les nations belligérantes." (Diplomatie de la Mer; livre iii, vol. 2, p. 16.) The mere absence or delay of a declaration is therefore not necessarily fatal to the legality or the notoriety of a State war, which actually exists.

It may also be observed that in many sudden cases of emergency, such as mutinies, revolts, civil war, and disturbances, quarrels between two factions in one State, or between two States of one Confederation, attempts by a political chief or party to acquire by force the control or exercise of the sovereign power, and so forth, actual war, and even blockade consequent thereon, will often exist without any formal document equivalent to a declaration of war. A military or political Chief resists the Government; a conflict takes place; the fleet declares for him, and blockades the port; or the Government naval force blockades the port which he holds, without any declaration of war, or other document equivalent thereto. There is obviously nothing in the mere absence of such a document to invalidate an effective blockade, if once established and strictly maintained. This position, therefore, of M. Delaville cannot, in my opinion, be maintained.

There remain some points which, though not alluded to by M. Delaville, are pertinent to the subject under consideration, namely, the legal validity of a de facto blockade of Gaeta by the Sardinian fleet:—

(a.) Gaeta is an exclusively military port, and actually besieged. If ever blockade can be justifiably resorted to, it is in order to reduce a besieged fortress; indeed the whole practice and doctrine of maritime blockade, if not the very idea of it, originated in such cases (see Grotius "De Jure," b. et p., lib. 3, cap. i, sec. 3, "ut si oppidum obsessum tenebam;" and the practice which then commenced has been subsequently extended to purely commercial ports and to ranges of coast, to the serious detriment of neutral interests. But this is not so at Gaeta; any neutral carrying supplies into Gaeta is indirectly but actually and materially aiding the garrison in its resistance: a state of circumstances which neutral Governments, whose ordinary and bonâ fide trade will not be interrupted by this particular blockade, will not fail to consider favourably to Sardinia.

(b.) There will be no very great reason to apprehend that this blockade will necessarily give rise to any grave international questions. Gaeta is, as it were, "isolated," in a maritime and commercial sense; mistakes, or undue interference, by the blockading force are not very likely to arise, more especially if this force acts discreetly, by warning and watching any suspicious vessel, and by not capturing, or sending in for adjudication, in any doubtful case.

(c.) Capture for breach of blockade is only a preliminary and provisional measure; the Prize Court of the captor may, and often does, decree restitution with costs and damages. In England this occurred in 1856, both as to the Baltic and Black Sea blockades in numerous instances; the Government of the captured vessel (thus) has access to a Tribunal before which its legal objections can be stated.

(d.) Although, in my opinion, blockade is strictly a right founded upon war, and only competent to a belligerent, yet it has often been (in fact) resorted to and enforced even by France herself, not only without a declaration of war, but without any war, de facto, existing, as a preliminary step, and (as it were) by way of "pressure" only. I am not aware that this country has condemned foreign vessels as prizes for violation of such blockades, but France has done this.

I will not multiply instances, or discuss the strict international legality of such blockades; but I will merely invite attention to two modern French works of the highest authority on the question, Pistoye et Duverdy, "Traité des Prises Maritimes" (1855), vol. i, p. 376 et seq. (and cases cited), and Hautefeuille, "Droits et Devoirs des Nations Neutres en temps de Guerre Maritime" (1849),

---

* [It was communicated in 1859, and has been seen by the Law Officers and reported on; it was dated, I think, in June.—E. H.]

1861

vol. iii, p. 10. "La guerre peut exister," say MM. Pistoye et Duverdy, "sans qu'il y ait eu une déclaration formelle. Souvent les déclarations de guerre ne surviennent qu'après des actes d'hostilités réciproques, qui, à eux seuls, constituaient l'état de guerre; et alors les déclarations . . . sont surabondantes." They even contend that blockade constitutes war: "on n'a pas déclaré la guerre, mais on la fait réellement."

These writers do not completely agree with Hautefeuille on the subject, but they discuss very acutely the cases which arose before the French Prize Courts, out of captures, for the breach of the French blockade of Buenos Ayres in 1846 and following years. These discussions throw a singular light on the view which the French Prize Courts, guided by the French Government, have taken of blockade without any declaration or act of war.

No war, de facto, existed between France and the Argentine Republic, and there was no declaration of war; but the "Fame" and the "Eliza Cornish," British vessels, were captured by the French, and condemned as prize for breaking this blockade. These cases are reported in "Pistoye et Duverdy," vol. i, pp. 387 and 389. All the efforts of Her Majesty's Government failed to obtain any redress from France in the case of the "Fame," which was brought under the Emperor's notice, legally and in the last resort, in 1854 (see Opinion of the Law Officers on case from Solicitor of the Treasury, March 23, 1857; Reports to Foreign Office, June 17, 1857, and October 15, 1857).

If this condemnation was legalized and justified internationally by France in 1854, how can the validity of a blockade of Gaeta be seriously disputed by this same Power in 1861, on the ground of the absence of a declaration of war? Surely the non-existence of any war must be a more formidable objection to the validity of a blockade than the non-existence of a declaration of war.

Upon the whole, therefore, more especially as no British interests are involved in the matter, I venture respectfully to advise your Lordship to take no notice of M. Delaville's doubts, but, if pressed by France for an explicit intimation of the views of Her Majesty's Government, to answer generally to the effect "that if Gaeta should be blockaded 'by a force sufficient,' according to the Declaration of Paris, 1856, 'really to prevent access' thereto, Her Majesty's Government would certainly not be disposed to seek to raise, or to encourage the raising of any international question as to the validity of such blockade; and that Her Majesty's Government did not (as at present advised) see any strong ground for anticipating that any great maritime Power would, in effect, raise any such question; that if, contrary to expectation, any serious international question should arise, it would be discussed, in the first instance, in the Prize Courts of the captor, and subsequently, if necessary, inter gentes, according to modern international law and usage. That the contingency of a blockade was so naturally connected with the protracted siege of a maritime fortress that no very obvious difficulty presented itself to Her Majesty's Government in the adoption of such a measure by the King of Sardinia under existing circumstances; that Her Majesty's Government must decline to discuss beforehand abstract hypothetical questions of international law, excepting under very special and urgent circumstances."

It will be for your Lordship to consider whether some intimation of the nature of this singular communication, made by M. Thouvenel to Lord Cowley, should not be given to Sardinia.

Naturalized British subjects. Passports, marriages, and children born abroad.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 31st December last, stating that with reference to Her Majesty's Advocate-General's Report dated the 19th December last, he was directed to transmit to us the draft of a despatch which your Lordship proposes to address to Lord Howard de Walden respecting the questions which he has raised regarding the passports of naturalized British subjects as to their marriages, and as to the status of their children born abroad. And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take this paper into consideration, with Lord Howard de Walden's despatches also inclosed, and report to your Lordship whether we concur in the proposed instructions.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the above-mentioned papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we have considered the draft despatch in question, and subject to the slight verbal alterations which we have made therein, we are of opinion that it is correct, and we concur in the proposed instructions.

Proposed Draft to Lord Howard de Walden.

My Lord, Foreign Office, January , 1861.

YOUR Lordship takes occasion, from circumstances which have lately occurred at Brussels connected with M. Ignatius Téleki, a naturalized British subject, to ask in your despatch No. 152 of the 3rd of December, for information on points which, though arising immediately in the case of that gentleman, involve general principles, and may, therefore, be more conveniently dealt with as doing so.

The first question is, whether a person who was naturalized as a British subject previously to the 24th of August, 1850, is entitled to a permanent passport; and the answer to it is, that, as the rule in regard to the limitation of time in passports granted to naturalized British subjects applies only to those naturalized subsequently to the above-mentioned date, there can be no question as to the right of a person naturalized [subsequently] to that date to receive, like any natural-born British subject, a passport not limited in regard to time.

Alteration suggested by the Law Officers:— "previously"

The second question is, whether a woman, either by birth a British subject, or a naturalized British subject, or an alien, is entitled on being married abroad to a naturalized subject to receive a passport in her new character of a married woman. The answer is, that, if the woman is a natural-born British subject, she does not lose that character by marrying a naturalized British subject, and that, consequently, she is entitled to a fresh passport as a British subject in her married name; but if the woman is a naturalized British subject, or an alien, then, as the woman cannot in her married state travel under her maiden name, and as, whatever may have been her nationality before marriage, she acquires upon marriage the nationality of her husband, she is entitled to be placed in regard to a passport on the same footing as her husband; and, consequently, in such a case Her Majesty's Ministers or Consuls would be authorised to act exceptionally, and to grant to the woman an original passport, subject to the same conditions as the passport held by her husband, that is to say, to a passport not limited in point of time, if her husband's passport is not limited, or limited so as to correspond with the limit of time at which her husband's passport will expire, if her husband's passport is limited. But in no case must the wife's name be inserted in the passport held by the husband previously to the marriage, for no Minister or Consul is authorised under any circumstances to insert an additional name in a passport, whatever number of names such passport when originally granted was stated to incude.

In a despatch of the same date as that to which I have already replied, namely, in your No. 151 of the 3rd of December, and in your letter to Mr. Hammond of the 24th, your Lordship asks three further questions:

1st. As regards the character of the children of a British naturalized subject born abroad; the answer is that such children share the character of their father, and are to be considered as naturalized British subjects, so long at least as they are under age and living with their father. But this is, of course, subject to the local law, which may rightly deal with children born in the country, whatever may be the circumstances of their father, as natural-born subjects of the country in which they were born.

1861

"Alteration suggested by the Law Officers:—
"the answer will be that they are so entitled."

2ndly. Whether naturalized subjects are entitled to be married at Her Majesty's Legations or Consulates: [I know no reason why, in this respect, naturalized British subjects should not be admitted to the same privileges as natural-born subjects of Her Majesty.]

3rdly. Whether naturalized subjects are to be presented at Court by Her Majesty's Diplomatic servants: and to this I reply that I see no ground on which a general rule excluding them from such presentations should be laid down; and I consider that Her Majesty's Representatives may properly use in regard to the presentation of naturalized British subjects the same discretion as they are in the habit of using in regard to natural-born.

Arms conveyed to the Danube in Sardinian vessels.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th January instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 21st December ultimo, on the subject of the arms conveyed to the Danube in Sardinian vessels, he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a note addressed by Aali Pasha to General Durando, the Sardinian Minister at Constantinople, stating the grounds on which the Turkish Government justifies its conduct with regard to this matter; and to request that I would take Aali Pasha's note into consideration, and inform your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, whether there appears to me to be anything objectionable in the principles maintained in this note.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a copy of the Treaty of the 31st July, 1854, between Sardinia and Turkey, referred to by Aali Pasha.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th January instant, transmitting all the correspondence which has passed between the Porte and the Sardinian Minister at Constantinople, in the possession of the Foreign Office, respecting the Sardinian vessels which have conveyed arms to the Danube, as requested in my letter of the 14th January instant.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That neither General Durando nor Aali Pasha gives any sufficient "constat" of the facts relating to each or any of the vessels in question. In the absence, therefore, of any statement of these facts, or of the Turkish law or regulations as to the importation of arms, or of any indication of the object or purpose for which your Lordship desires my opinion upon Aali Pasha's note of the 16th December, 1860, exclusively, it is not easy for me to deal with that note in a satisfactory manner, more especially as the despatch of Sir H. Bulwer No. 818 of the 5th December (alluded to in my Report on this subject of the 21st December last) is not now before me.

According, however, to the best opinion which I can form in the present very imperfect state of my information as to the real merits or points in dispute, I am of opinion that your Lordship's question must be answered in the affirmative; and that whatever may be the general character of the principles maintained in the note of December 15th, their application to the case in question is, at all events, open to grave objection; I will proceed to explain my meaning more fully.

This note is in answer to one from General Durando of the 10th December, which latter note is, in my opinion, generally sound, and closely reasoned, and the arguments in which are not fully or satisfactorily met or disposed of by Aali Pasha.

In forming this opinion I assume—

1st. That the facts stated by General Durando, and not controverted by Aali Pasha, are true.

2nd. That no very important facts exist in support of the Turkish case, which are not stated by Aali Pasha.

3rd. That there are no Turkish municipal, fiscal, or local laws or regulations which bear materially on the question, none such being cited or referred to by Aali Pasha.

4th. That the Turkish Government is ignorant of the particulars of the intended revolt, apparently against Austria, vaguely alluded to by Aali Pasha, and of the names of the persons concerned therein, who caused the arms to be imported.

On these assumptions I am unable to see how the Turkish Government can maintain its right to chase and capture these vessels, or any of them, on the high seas, and after they had left or passed Constantinople, and were beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Turkey; more especially after and notwithstanding that General Durando (when applied to) had refused to join in or sanction their search or detention. True, they were not in fact captured on the high seas; but this was ordered, and nothing but an accident prevented its being done. Aali Pasha seems to me to contend for this right, though in vague terms, which right General Durando denies, and, in my opinion, rightly denies to exist.

(a.) As to the seizure of three of the vessels at Soulina, in transitu, which was effected by Turkish authority, although this may have been legal, I confess that I do not understand upon what precise ground it is now justified by Aali Pasha.

If there is any Turkish law or regulation authorizing the seizure of vessels at Soulina for having arms and ammunition on board, or for making there, or in any other Turkish port, a false or deficient declaration as to their cargo, or even for painting out the ship's name originally placed on the stern, it is singular that none such is quoted or alluded to by the Pasha. The vessels were apparently, and I presume really, bound to Turkish ports on the Danube (in the Principalities), and it is strange that these ports are not named; if there were any strong grounds to suspect that the arms would be clandestinely landed, Custom-house officers should have been put on board to see that "bulk was not broken," and that nothing was illegally landed on Turkish territory before the vessel arrived at her port of destination, delivered her regular papers at the Custom-house (or "entered inwards" as we should say), and complied with the local laws and regulations; but these measures were very different from that adopted, namely, summary seizure in transitu, of ship, crew, and cargo, and this, as far far as I can see, without any express law or regulation imposing or authorizing such seizure, or any proof that such vessel so seized had broken such law or regulation.

(b.) The seizure of a foreign vessel bound to a Turkish port on the Danube, by the Turkish authorities at Soulina, more especially without reference to the Consul of the nation whose flag and papers she carries, is a proceeding at variance with Turkish usage, and, probably, with her Capitulations or Treaties with Sardinia. At all events it is a measure which all maritime Powers must look at with natural disapprobation and jealousy, and which does not seem to me to be justified by the circumstances of this case.

(c.) I do not observe that it is suggested by Aali Pasha that any improper use was about to be made of these arms in Turkey; it is intimated that they were to be used against Austria; but no particulars whatever are given, and it is notorious that no insurrection exists against Austria nor Turkish rule. It is not even stated that Austria had interfered, or given information of their arrival, or formally requested their seizure by the Turkish Government; and therefore the mere apprehension that they might possibly be intended to be used (hereafter) against Austria, would not, of itself, justify their seizure by Turkey.

(d.) The Turkish Government has not, by inspection of the ship's papers, statements of the master, by intercepted letters, or by any other evidence, established that the ships were in the act of carrying out any breach of Turkish law or any hostile design even against Austria.

(e.) The fact that Turkey has consented to release the vessels, with their cargoes, intact, and without further proceedings, on condition of their abandoning this particular voyage, leaving the question of compensation or damages open, but refusing to pay any such compensation, looks very much as if the Turkish Government had either no legal justification whatsoever to adduce, or had (in effect) no case to establish the validity of the seizure. If the seizure was lawful, or in pursuance of any Turkish law or regulation, this would naturally have been put in force by fine, forfeiture, or otherwise, or, at least, proceedings would have been commenced eo intuitu, which might have been suspended or abandoned on the Sardinian Government consenting to settle the matter by the vessel being permitted to return. But this is not so; they are (first) seized, and (then) restored sub conditione, without any legal proceedings being instituted, or any proof of their master's or owner's guilt being adduced, even confidentially, so as to satisfy Sardinia.

(f.) With respect to the Treaty of 1854 between Sardinia and Turkey, and more especially to Article VI, I cannot say that the arguments of Aali Pasha are well-founded. I am of opinion that the answer to his question at page 10, "Peut-on appliquer à l'esprit de cet Acte le principe de ce que la loi ne défend pas, elle le permet?" cannot be considered, as he contends, to be evidently in the negative. The sixth Article contains a very special and peculiar stipulation, forbidding all trade whatever in the enumerated articles of "cannons, gunpowder, balls, and projectiles for fire-arms." No general words follow; and it proceeds to stipulate for the further regulations therein mentioned as to the sale of "cannons," the importation of which is permitted in a qualified manner. The construction of this Article cannot, in my opinion, be extended at the pleasure of the Turkish Government, and without the consent or acquiescence of Sardinia, to other articles such as (say), muskets, swords, and accoutrements; nor can it justify other proceedings, as to cannon, than those contained therein. I have already pointed out, in my previous report, that the Turkish authorities might (as to cannon) have proceeded under that Article; but this was not done, nor can the words or spirit of the Article per se justify their seizing in transitu the ship, or the rest of the cargo, as a matter of course. The fire-arms (which, I presume, are the real subject in contest), were a lawful article of commerce under the circumstances. The rule "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius" applies, in my opinion, to trade in enumerated articles in a Commercial Treaty, at all events when no controlling or general words are introduced therein.

Articles IX and XIV of this Treaty might, I should have thought, have had a material bearing on this case, but neither Aali Pasha nor General Durando allude to them. If (for instance) under Article XIV, any Sardinian subject had been proved to have been concerned in "strange or illicit speculations" (as in the clandestine importation of cannon, gunpowder, and ball, contrary to Article VI, or of large quantities of military fire-arms for other than bonâ fide commercial objects, and in a suspicious manner), the "repression" of the speculation might have been required of Sardinia under this Article, but this was not done; so, under Article XIV, if there were defects or frauds in the matter of the names of the ships or of their owners, the Turks might have invoked this Article, but there is no allusion to it.

(g.) In short, although the Turkish Government might easily have prevented any dangerous or improper landing of arms and ammunition, or even have sequestered them when landed, if it had prudently confined itself to the terms of the Treaty, or even limited its action to dealing with its own subjects exclusively, it might have attained the same object by various other means, as by enforcing reasonable Custom-house or port regulations, requiring the deposit of all such objects in a safe place under official custody and under bond, and so forth, or even by their absolute confiscation; and the punishment of all Turkish subjects concerned in their importation when once they had been landed on her territory. Turkey appears to me in this case to have proceeded, although from honest and praiseworthy motives, indiscreetly and irregularly; exhibiting that strange mixture of supineness and energy, of leniency and summary rigour, of want of foresight, of regularity and method, united with a determination to carry out her immediate object at all hazards, which is often seen in Oriental policy, and which justly exposes this policy to animadversion from more civilized Governments.

Your Lordship will not fail to observe that the opinions I have expressed in my Report of the 21st December, 1860, agree in many points with the positions advanced by General Durando in his note of December 10, of the contents of which I was wholly ignorant when I wrote that Report; and I cannot, under such circumstances, say that this opinion is altered by Aali Pasha's answer to the General of the 15th December.

Lastly. I must observe that the various and peculiar geographical and political considerations connected with the Turkish jurisdiction over the Dardanelles and the mouth of the Danube, to which I need not more particularly advert, and the peculiarities attending the exercise of Turkish jurisdiction over the persons and property of Christian nations, will sufficiently justify, and even demand, the exercise of a jealous vigilance on the part of all maritime Powers, in every case in which, under whatsoever circumstances, the Turkish Government attempts to carry out and to justify the seizure, in either of those localities, of the merchant-ships of any European Power against the consent, and notwithstanding the formal objections, of the resident Minister of that Power.

I greatly regret the length of this Report, which I trust will be excused, owing to the peculiarity of the circumstances.

France.

Mr. Vincent's application to forward a Commission issued by the Court of Divorce to Her Majesty's Consul at Nice through the Foreign Office.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th January, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Vincent, requesting that a Commission issued by the Court of Divorce to Her Majesty's Consul at Nice may be forwarded by the Foreign Office, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether Mr. Vincent's application should be complied with.

In obedience to your Lordship's command I have the honour to report—

That I beg to call attention to the fact that this question has already given rise to considerable discussion with France. I would refer particularly to the Reports of the Law Officers of the 15th August, 1852, the 28th April, 1855, 22nd February and the 21st June, 1856.

It would seem from Mr. Hammond's letter of the 2nd May, 1856, recited with last Report (1856), that the suggestion of the Law Officers to the effect that the international arrangements on this subject should be made reciprocal in all cases, was not adopted; and I presume therefore that notwithstanding the Statute 19 and 20 Vict., cap 113, there is not at present in France any means of procuring the examination, by French authority, of a witness, in a suit pending in an English Court. I am not, however, aware how this is in point of fact. If I am in error, I must request further information.

The French Government has shown a disposition to interfere with the working of British Commissions for taking evidence, even when conducted by private persons; and it may therefore object to British Consuls acting in such matters: but if it will neither permit the adoption of such a course, nor make any reciprocal arrangement on the basis of the above Statute (19 and 20 Vict., cap. 113) its conduct is unreasonable, and British interests in this matter are placed in a very awkward predicament in France.

As this case now stands, and assuming that there is not in France any system of procedure corresponding with that provided by the above Statute in consimili casu in England, and bearing in mind that Her Majesty's Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes has, howsoever, inserted the name and description of the Consul in the Commission issued under its Seal, I should advise your Lordship to comply with Mr. Vincent's request, which I observe is limited to "forwarding by the first post" the Commission to the Consul.

Mr. Vincent should be informed that this has been done, and should be desired to take care that some competent person at Nice shall produce before the Consul the witness named in the Commission, and shall direct the Consul as to the formal mode of executing and returning the Commission, and shall pay on the spot all necessary expenses, including the Consul's reasonable fees and charges.

The Consul should be furnished with a copy of your Lordship's letter to Mr. Vincent; he should be instructed to accept the Commission, to act formally and cautiously in the matter under the advice of the person designated by Mr. Vincent, bearing in mind that he (the Consul) is to act as the officer of the Court pro hâc vice, and in that character to facilitate and to expedite, as far as in him lies, the despatch of the business in hand; and to avoid, as far as possible raising any obstacle or difficulty in the execution and return of the Commission, observing the directions contained therein, particularly as to assuming a Notary

He should also be (confidentially) instructed to proceed as if this were a matter of course, and of a purely Consular character; not to do anything to invite or excite the interference of the French authorities; but if any such interference should take place, to defer thereto, and to write at once for further instructions.

Claims of Messrs. Rohmer for compensation for property destroyed at Catania.

My Lord,
Doctors' Commons, January 28, 1861.*

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th January instant, stating that with reference to former correspondence, he was directed to transmit to me a letter, dated January 14, 1861, together with its inclosures, from Messrs. Rohmer, of Manchester, requesting that steps may be taken to obtain compensation for them on account of certain property of theirs which was destroyed at Catania during the recent troubles in Sicily; and to request that I would take Messrs. Rohmer's letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to it.

The despatch from the Foreign Office, alluded to in Messrs. Rohmer's letter, was inclosed for reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That an answer may be returned to Messrs. Rohmer to the effect "that there is no statement in their letter upon which Her Majesty's Government can offer them any advice, or can act or interfere on their behalf with any foreign Government."

I observe (1st) that Messrs. Rohmer give no explanation of the delay which has occurred on their part in making any application to your Lordship.

(2.) That the only statement of the facts connected with the loss in question (namely, that contained in the letter of Mr. Just to Her Majesty's Vice-Consul, dated Catania, June 1, 1860), is as short and vague as possible. From this letter it would seem that the loss was caused by an accidental fire which arose during some military conflict.

(3.) There is no report from the Vice-Consul.

(4.) The right of Messrs. Rohmer Brothers, on the ground of their British nationality, to the support of Her Majesty's Government is somewhat vaguely stated Their senior partner is said to be a naturalized British subject; but no date or particulars of his birth or naturalization, and no particulars as to his co-partners, are forthcoming.

(5.) The nature and degree of their interest in the goods in question is very obscure. Mr. Henry Just, in his above-cited letter to the Vice-Consul, speaks of the goods as his goods, and desires that he may be indemnified; he makes no allusion to Rohmer Brothers, or to his acting as Agent for any absent British firm, either as his principal or partner: Messrs. Rohmer Brothers speak of "their partners Messrs. Henry Just and Co., of Catania."

(6.) Messrs. Rohmer and Co., although cognizant of the Foreign Office despatch to the Consuls of 23rd June, 1860, make no reasonable attempts to bring their particular case within its terms or spirit. They adopt a tone which is rather in the nature of a general demand for support to a claim against anybody they can succeed in making answerable, than a bonâ fide and business-like statement of the facts connected with their loss, and of the grounds of their claim; and they do not, under all the circumstances, appear to me to deserve any assistance from Her Majesty's Government in making out (at least) a primâ facie case, which they ought to do for themselves.

---

* See further Report, page 49.

I do not mean to suggest that these defects should be pointed out to the applicants (who should merely receive a general intimation that they have not made out any primâ facie case), but I mention them for your Lordship's guidance.

Trial of British residents at Bonn for libel in the case of Captain Macdonald.

My Lord,
Doctors' Commons, January 30, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th January instant, stating that he was directed to inclose a despatch (No. 94) which your Lordship has received from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Berlin, reporting the verdict which has been given at Bonn, at the trial of the English residents who had been accused of a libel in regard to the proceedings against Captain Macdonald.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that, as the legal proceedings in Prussia upon this subject, and upon the case of Captain Macdonald, have now terminated, he was directed to refer us to the whole correspondence which has taken place in the matter; and in requesting us to take these papers into consideration, he was to inform us that your Lordship does not wish to dispute the judgment of the regular Courts of law in Prussia, but that your Lordship desires to know whether there is any part of the conduct of the Executive Government of Prussia of which Her Majesty's Government can properly complain as illegal, and at variance with the spirit of international law, or unfriendly towards Great Britain.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the conduct of the Executive Government of Prussia is to be considered with reference to three separate matters:—

1. The arrest, detention, and punishment of Captain Macdonald.

2. The language used by Staats-Procurator Möller, in conducting the prosecution against Captain Macdonald; and

3. The prosecution of British subjects at Bonn for an alleged libel on Staats-Procurator Möller, provoked by his use of that language.

Taking them in order—

1. We are of opinion that, assuming the acts charged against Captain Macdonald to have taken place, his arrest, trial, and subsequent punishment were matters within the jurisdiction of the Prussian tribunals; and we do not discover any ground on which its illegality, so far as Prussian law is concerned, can be maintained. The detention of Captain Macdonald from the 13th September until the 15th, without the issue of a warrant of committal, would have given rise to some doubt in our minds of the strict legality of the course pursued. But in the face of the opinion on this point expressed by the Counsel Kyll (when consulted on the part of Her Majesty's Government), and of the reasons stated for such opinion, we cannot take upon ourselves to pronounce such detention contrary to the Municipal law of the country.

2. The Staats-Procurator Möller having been already reprimanded for the abusive language employed by him in the conduct of the prosceution against Captain Macdonald, we think no further complaint on that head can be made on the part of Her Majesty's Government against that of Prussia.

3. The prosecution by the authority of the Prussian Government of certain British subjects at Bonn for libel, although a most harsh and vindictive proceeding, appears to have been in conformity with the law of the country. The defendants had an open trial according to the Prussian law; and the judgment and sentences appear to have been within the competence of the tribunal.

There has been no violation of international law, assuming that the provisions of the Municipal law (to which foreigners, being within the country, are liable) have been observed.

These observations relate to the legal aspects of the case.

In a moral point of view, having regard to the relations between the two countries, the conduct of the Prussian Government appears to us to have been in a high degree unfriendly. Prussian law was enforced with extreme and unnecessary harshness, and in a manner not required for the purposes of justice. To throw a person of the rank and station of Captain Macdonald into prison, and refuse his liberation on bail, was an act which in England we should ascribe to a malignant spirit, violating the limits of a temperate administration of justice.

The rude refusal of the Prussian official, when informed of the rank held by Captain Macdonald in the body guard of his Sovereign, was not consistent with ordinary international courtesy, and is fit to be observed on, because it has not been disavowed by the Prussian Government. We feel confident that no Prussian officer or gentleman of the rank of Captain Macdonald would have been treated in a similar manner in England, under the same circumstances.

We will, lastly, advert to the spirit which dictated a prosecution for libel on an official whose conduct had been censured by his own Government, and the institution of that prosecution whilst Captain Macdonald's case was still pending. The Prussian Government has not thought fit to temper its justification of these extreme acts of legality by any expression of regret; and we cannot but regard its conduct as in a high degree unfriendly, and regardless of international goodwill.

Sardinian blockade of Gaeta.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Naples (No. 11), inclosing a copy of a notice inserted in the official journal of that city, announcing that an effective blockade of the port of Gaeta had been established by a Sardinian squadron; and to request that I would take this despatch and its inclosures into consideration, and if I should be of opinion that the notice of blockade is sufficient, I would prepare, at my earliest convenience, a draft of a notification to be inserted in the "London Gazette."

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to add, that Her Majesty's Government consider the King of Sardinia and the King of the Two Sicilies to be at war with each other.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Consul only transmits a written copy of Admiral Persano's notice, which is stated to have been inserted in the "official journal" (whatever that may be) published at Naples on the 23rd January ultimo. He does not even transmit a copy of this newspaper; nor does he state that any official intelligence of the fact of the blockade had arrived at Naples; nor does he appear to have asked the authorities any question on the subject.

It is obvious that the mere transmission of this copy by the Consul is not sufficient to enable Her Majesty's Government officially to publish the fact of the blockade in the "London Gazette."

In order to enable Her Majesty's Government safely and regularly to take this course, the Sardinian Minister in London ought formally to announce to your Lordship the fact of the establishment of the blockade, by a competent force, from a particular date, accompanying this announcement by any material document (such as Admiral Persano's notice) at his discretion, in the usual and regular diplomatic style; or there must, at all events, be some formal and official constat, by communication from some official person in a position to declare it, of the fact of the existence of the blockade.

As, in all probability, the blockade was really established on the 20th January ultimo, some confidential intimation may possibly be given to the Sardinian Legation to the effect that it should announce the fact to your Lordship in such a formal and exact manner as may enable Her Majesty's Government to publish a regular notification in the "London Gazette."

I feel it my duty reluctantly to point out the very vague and unbusiness-like character of the Consul's communication: even the correspondent of any mercantile firm would, under similar circumstances, either have sent a copy of the newspaper, or stated (of his own knowledge) that intelligence of the blockade being actually established had arrived at Naples, on a particular date, by some particular channel, from Gaeta, and that on applying to authorities they had confirmed the truth of such intelligence.

Mr. Acland's claim for costs in re. Mirza Dawood v. Aga Mahomed Sadick.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd January ultimo, stating that with reference to my reports of the 25th June and the 7th August last, respecting the claim of Mr. Acland, for costs arising out of the suit of Mirza Dawood v. Aga Mahomed Sadick, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the previous papers, a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Teheran respecting the present circumstances of this case; and to request that I would take this matter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which Her Majesty's Government should pursue.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as in this case Her Majesty's Government is (in effect) at present only acting as the medium of communication between Mr. Acland on the one part, and Mirza Dawood and the Persian Government on the other, I would suggest that your Lordship may properly furnish Mr. Acland with a copy of Mr. Alison's No. 68, and await the result of this communication.

Although Mr. Alison's letter is not very explicit on the point, I assume that Mirza Dawood does not dispute his primary liability to Mr. Acland in respect of the costs in question: he (in effect) seems to admit his liability as to at least two-thirds of the amount; and he suggests that the Persian Government should, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, which has been arranged between the Government and himself, pay the remaining third.

This suggestion, which does not seem unreasonable, has not apparently been conveyed to the Persian Government, by him or by Mr. Alison.

In this state of things, however, it is for Mr. Acland in the first place to submit to your Lordship's consideration the course which he would desire Mr. Alison now to adopt on his behalf, and your Lordship can then consider the propriety of doing either what Mr. Acland may desire, or of taking any other course.

Sardinian blockade of Gaeta.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of this day's date, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Sardinian Minister at this Court, announcing that an effective blockade of Gaeta was established by the Sardinian naval forces on the 20th January last; and to request that I would take this note into consideration, and if I should be satisfied with the sufficiency of the notice, that I would prepare the usual Notification for insertion in the "London Gazette."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this note into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That although his Excellency the Marquis d'Azeglio has not transmitted any copy of a despatch from Admiral Persano, or any other document in confirmation of his statement which would have been desirable, and does not state at what date either his Government or he himself received information of the establishment of the blockade in question, yet that his note of the 4th instant, may, in my opinion, under the circumstances, be inserted in the "London Gazette."

PORTUGAL.

Claim of Portuguese Consul in British Guiana to take charge of effects of Portuguese subjects dying intestate.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 11, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th of November last, stating that with reference to the Queen's Advocate's Reports of the 18th of September and 17th of October last, on the subject of the claim made by the Portuguese Consul in British Guiana to take charge of the effects of Portuguese subjects dying intestate without heirs on the spot, he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the Colonial Office, in which the Secretary of State for the Colonies requests your Lordship's opinion, whether according to the IInd Article of the Treaty between this country and Portugal of July 3rd, 1842, property belonging to Portuguese subjects dying intestate in British Guiana without heirs, can be claimed by the Crown of Portugal, or whether it remains with the Crown of England. And to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which should be returned upon this point to the Colonial Office.

The former papers were inclosed for convenience of reference.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report that the right of the Crown of England or of the Crown of Portugal to the personal property of Portuguese subjects dying intestate in British Guiana, and without heirs, continues to depend (according to the general rule) on the place of the intestate's legal domicile at the time of his death. Thus, if a Portuguese subject dies intestate and without heirs domiciled in the British dominions, the Queen will be entitled to his personal property; but if, although dying in the British dominions, he were legally domiciled in Portugal at the time of his death, the King of Portugal would be entitled thereto, if so entitled by the law of Portugal. The terms of Article II of the Treaty of July 3, 1842, do not appear to us directly to affect this particular question.

Having thus answered the particular question on which the Secretary of State for the Colonies requests your Lordship's opinion, we must observe that the words of the Treaty are in favour of the claims put forward on behalf of the Portuguese Consul. The inconvenience, however, of carrying out the letter of the Treaty would be extreme, as the Queen's Advocate has already pointed out. The Treaty applies in its full scope to every part of the British dominions; it may be expected that if the Treaty be allowed its full scope in favour of Portugal, other nations, especially those having what are known as "most favoured nation clauses" in their Treaties with this country, will demand to be placed in this respect on the same footing; and these various requirements could not be yielded without very extensive alterations in the law and administration of intestacy, not only in England, but throughout the Queen's dominions, the practical operation and result of which will, in our opinion, give rise to very serious difficulties.

Under these circumstances it is most desirable that, if possible, the question which has been now first raised by Portugal (after a tacit acquiescence or silence of nearly twenty years) should be restricted to British Guiana.

With the view of effecting this object we would recommend an offer being made to alter the local Ordinance by rendering it incumbent on the Administrator-General, without delay, and from time to time, to make returns to the Portuguese Consul of the names, residences, and designations of all Portuguese subjects dying intestate in the Colony, and of all such other material particulars as to their effects, and their known or supposed heirs, as it may be in his power to do; and also by directing the proper Colonial Court, on application to the Portuguese Consul, to authorise him to take charge of the effects of deceased Portuguese in the particular cases provided for by the terms of Article II of the Treaty in question.

Claim of Mr. A. Robinson. Detention of "Mio Zio" at Port Mahon.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 14, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. A. Robinson, dated February 4th, stating the circumstances under which the Spanish authorities at Port Mahon have decreed that a cargo of maize, which he had shipped at Constantinople for England on board the ship "Mio Zio," and which ship put into Port Mahon, was unfit to be sent on to the United Kingdom, and that the master of the vessel was entitled to the full freight and demurrage which would have been due to him had he carried the cargo to its destination.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a letter from the Board of Trade dated February 9th, expressing their opinion upon the subject, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government can properly interfere in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere in this matter.

Mr. Robinson's statement of the circumstances is meagre; and he must be in possession of important facts which he does not state. The ship was a Roman ship; the proceedings at Port Mahon were (for all that appears to the contrary) perfectly legal proceedings, and some Decree (of a Court of Law apparently) has been made, against which Mr. Robinson has appealed, I presume to some superior Spanish Court having jurisdiction, although he does not expressly state this.

He seeks the interference of Her Majesty's Government, pendente lite, on the ground of the non-competence of the Spanish authorities; but he has either admitted the jurisdiction of the Court a quo, or, at all events, he has admitted and founded the jurisdiction of the Court ad quem, by himself voluntarily having recourse to it. "The Spanish authorities" have not interfered; and the jurisdiction of the Spanish Courts cannot at present be questioned by Her Majesty's Government.

All this need not be stated to Mr. Robinson; but it is sufficient to show the impossibility of complying with his request. He may be informed that Her Majesty's Government must decline for the present to interfere in a matter on which legal proceedings, at his instance and on his behalf, are pending.

1861

The Consul at Port Mahon should report fully on the case, which may ultimately have an important bearing on British commercial interests.

CHILE.

Question of forwarding legal documents through Foreign Office from a foreign Government. Mr. Thomson.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Chile (No. 83), asking for instructions with regard to the question of forwarding through the Foreign Office legal documents which he receives from the Chilian Government, and to request that I would take Mr. Thomson's despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to him.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That inasmuch as Mr. Thomson either does not know or does not explain what is the nature of the "document" in question, or what is the Chilian law to which he alludes (but of which he sends no copy or abstract), it is not possible to deal with this question in a satisfactory manner.

His omission to give any explanation either of the nature of the "document," or of the peculiar reasons which induced him to refuse to forward it as desired, or of the Chilian law on the subject, under which it is suggested that he ought to have forwarded it, is most unaccountable, and leaves Her Majesty's Government practically in the same situation as if it had received no despatch at all from Mr. Thomson; for it has received from him nothing upon which it can found any definite instructions to him.

Mr. Thomson describes "the document" as addressed by the "Judge of Commerce at Valparaiso" to the "Judge of Commerce at Birmingham:" he must be perfectly aware of the fact that there is no such personage as the "Judge of Commerce" at Birmingham; but he seems not to have suggested this to the Chilian authorities, and he does not explain who is really intended by them; whether (for instance) the Judge of the County Court, the Commissioner of Bankruptcy, the Mayor, the Recorder, or who else.

The note of Señor Varas of the 28th of November speaks of "los Jueces" (the Judges) of Birmingham," and says nothing about the "Judge of Commerce." This note also speaks of the document as "el adjunto despacho rogatorio;" probably meaning a rogatory Commission from some Chilian Tribunal to some Birmingham magistrates or judicial officers, perhaps to empower them to take evidence in a suit pending in Chile; but at all events showing that Mr. Thomson could have had no difficulty in knowing and explaining what was its real nature and object.

Whilst, therefore, I have seldom seen a more defective despatch than Mr. Thomson's I can easily conceive that he might have explained to the Chilian Government "that, although he would transmit such Commission to Birmingham, he regretted that he could not undertake, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to cause it to be duly executed and returned—Her Majesty's Government not having, by English law, any jurisdiction or power of this kind, although the object might be attained by means of the English Courts;" and if he had been aware of the Statute 19 & 20 Vict., cap. 113 (see especially sec. 2), he might easily have put the matter in a proper train by bringing this Statute to the knowledge of the Chilian Government.

Possibly and hypothetically therefore, the instructions to be transmitted to him for his guidance may be framed on this basis: but he has left the whole matter in such obscurity that this aspect of the case must be only conjectural.

I would venture to observe that as an extended international comity and reciprocity in the transmission and execution of legal documents between Courts of Law is highly desirable for the furtherance of the interests of justice (at least in a British point of view), and more especially so in the case of so distant a country as Chile, in which there exist large and increasing British interests, a hint to this effect might not be thrown away upon Mr. Thomson. The safe transmission of such documents, and the affording every ordinary and formal assistance in regard to them, appears to me to be one of the many important duties of Legations; and foreign Governments will never afford any facilities in such cases if they are thus peremptorily discouraged by British Legations in limine.

* See further Report, page 44.

In such cases every facility should be afforded, and the legal impediments and obstacles by which Her Majesty's Government is disabled from doing all that may be requested should be courteously and distinctly explained to foreign Governments, to whom these obstacles are not apparent or easily intelligible; and they should be referred to the Statute, of which copies should be sent to Her Majesty's Legations, and possibly a circular, for their guidance in a matter of such great legal and international importance.

It should be distinctly understood that it is the British Courts, and not Her Majesty's Government or Her Majesty's Legations, which are exclusively empowered to act under the Statute. But Her Majesty's Legations should point this out, and should not object to transmit papers when formally requested so to do.

Mr. Blake's complaint against authorities at Palermo, in the case of a cargo of corn on board the "Hannibal."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Blake, dated 15th of February, 1861, complaining of the conduct pursued by the authorities at Palermo with regard to a cargo of Indian corn shipped for a port in the United Kingdom, by Messrs. Cole and Prossor of Waterford.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a letter from the Board of Trade, expressing their opinion upon the subject; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government can properly interfere in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have the honour to report—

That there is no ground whatsoever for the interference of Her Majesty's Government in this matter.

The "Hannibal" is an Ionian vessel; and there would appear to be some proceedings pending before some Court at Palermo, at the instance of the master (although this is not expressly stated); the parties interested (as is too often the case) are withholding important particulars, of which they are obviously in possession.

However this may be, they expressly state that their correspondents at Palermo, Messrs. Ingham and Whitaker, are in possession of the bill of lading, and have full power to act for the owners of the cargo; and there is, therefore, no reason for the special intervention of the Consul. He should be instructed to report fully on the circumstances of the case, and on its general bearing on British interests.

UNITED STATES.

Slave Trade carried on under flag of seceded States.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying letter from the Admiralty, dated 9th February, 1861, representing that it is important that the commanders of Her Majesty's cruisers engaged in the suppression of the Slave Trade should be furnished with immediate instructions for their guidance in the event of their falling in with vessels engaged, or suspected of being engaged, in the Slave Trade, and which may be sailing really or ostensibly under the flag of one or more of the States that have recently seceded from the American Confederation.

1861

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that the points on which the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty wish to be informed are :—

1. Whether Her Majesty's cruizers are to treat vessels hoisting the flags of such seceding States as vessels belonging to established Governments with which Great Britain has no Treaty for the suppression of the Slave Trade ; or,

2. Whether the Treaty made with the United States on the subject of Slave Trade, namely, the Treaty of August 9, 1842 (Hertslet's Treaties, vol. vi, p. 853), is binding upon the seceding States ; and,

3. Whether such vessels are to be treated as vessels not entitled to the protection of any flag, and consequently liable to capture and condemnation ?

And Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that we would take this letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our early convenience, our opinion upon the points put in the Admiralty letter ; and further, with any observations which we may have to offer as to the instructions which it would be proper to give to the commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers in reference to this matter.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken the subject into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That the national character of the vessels in question must, in our opinion, be determined not by the flag which they may hoist, but by the "ship's papers," which they may exhibit. A discrepancy between the national character of the flag and that of the papers may, indeed, give rise to suspicion, and, in some special cases, may justify search or detention, and even capture; but, if the vessels in question produce a regular set of "United States' ship's papers," the mere fact of their not hoisting the flag of the United States, or of their hoisting a secession (or "Palmetto") flag, or any other flag, will not, of itself, justify Her Majesty's naval officers in treating them otherwise than as "vessels of the United States," or in treating them as vessels not entitled to the protection of any flag, and will not justify their capture, even with slaves on board.

The fact, however, of any vessel hoisting an unrecognized flag (as a "Palmetto flag") will justify boarding, and reasonable search and scrutiny of all her papers; and if such vessels should (under whatever flag) produce not United States' papers, but only papers purporting to be issued by the Government of one or more of the seceding States, then, inasmuch as these States are not recognized by Her Majesty's Government as sovereign and independent States inter gentes, Her Majesty's naval officers will, in strict maritime law, be justified primâ facie in treating the vessels in question as "not entitled to the protection of any flag." They must, however, bear in mind the necessity of acting with peculiar caution and circumspection in all such cases.

With respect to the nature of the general instructions which may properly be given to the Commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers, we must observe that this is obviously a question of Imperial policy, and as such beyond our province; the peculiar nature and actual condition of the (now) dis-United States, the disposition and feeling, and the future (or contemplated) policy both of Her Majesty's Government and of the Federal Government, in relation to the seceding States, quoad this particular matter, and various other considerations, must be kept in view.

If Her Majesty's Government have it in contemplation to observe a rigorous system of neutrality and non-intervention, as between the Federal Government and the seceding States, and to recognize the seceding State Governments, or the seceding Federal Government (when formed) as a de facto sovereign and independent Government, then it may not be expedient to treat their flag, at once, as unknown and unrecognized, or to capture or condemn vessels carrying on the Slave Trade when they produce secession papers.

If, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government is determined not in any event to permit the vessels of the seceding States to carry on the Slave Trade as "vessels of the United States," after and notwithstanding their secession, and under their separate Government-flag and papers, it will be expedient that it should at once take up and maintain this position.

Her Majesty's Government is, in our opinion, entitled, by international law, to refuse altogether to recognize the flag and papers of the seceding States, but it must, of course, be prepared for the possible results of this line of action.

We invite attention to the Constitution of the United States, especially Article I, section 8, paragraph 3, section 10; Article II, section 2; and Article VI, section 2, in any international discussion of this matter.

Mr. Blake's claim. Case of the "Hannibal."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th February instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 16th February instant,* on the case of the ship "Hannibal" at Palermo, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a further letter which your Lordship has received from Mr. Blake dated the 19th February ; and to request that I would report, at my earliest convenience, whether the statements contained in these papers induce me to alter the opinion which I have already expressed on this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That I have no hesitation in answering your Lordship's question in the negative.

The "Hannibal" is not a British vessel, and the Consul has (I presume) no jurisdiction over her; legal proceedings are pending before some tribunal, which the applicants do not explain or describe ; their (British) agents, fully empowered to act for them, and in possession of the bill of lading (giving the legal title to the cargo), are on the spot; and their "demand" that the British Consul should in his official capacity interfere, or their supposition that he could interfere with any effect upon some unexplained ground, is simply ridiculous. They must be perfectly well aware that he cannot compel the captain against his will to complete, or even to proceed on, the voyage ; that if their own agents cannot do anything effectual, neither can the Consul ; whilst if their agents can carry out their instructions, the Consul's interference is needless. It does not appear that these agents have ever applied to the Consul.

Claim of Mr. Casaubon to exemption from conscription, on the ground of being born in the Mauritius, although of a French father.

Doctors' Commons, February 21, 1861.*

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris (No. 246), inclosing a copy of a letter addressed to his Excellency by Mr. Casaubon, who states that he was born in the Mauritius, of a French father, and who claims the protection of the British Embassy as a British subject, in order to procure his exemption from having to draw for the approaching conscription of the 1st proximo; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be sent to Earl Cowley thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That assuming Mr. Casaubon to have been born in a British Colony in 1837, and to have always resided therein, until he came, for the first time in his life, to Paris, when of full age by the law of England, to study medicine there, with the intention of returning to the Mauritius on the completion of his education, and assuming him to have done nothing to forfeit his claim to British protection, I am, as at present advised, of opinion that he is entitled to a certificate of British nationality, and (thereupon) to exemption from the conscription, notwithstanding that he may be the son of a Frenchman.

He states that the British Consul refused him (on this latter ground) a certificate of his British nationality, which certificate the French authorities very reasonably require him to produce. No copy of the certificate required is given; and there is no precise statement of what passed between the Consul and Mr. Casaubon. In short no explanation is forthcoming on this point, of which Earl Cowley takes no notice.

It does not appear whether Mr. Casaubon has ever received a British passport, or been formally recognized as a British subject, as, for instance, by Consular registration, or otherwise: the Consul is of course not bound to accept Mr. Casaubon's unsupported assertion of the facts; he may require reasonable proof of their truth, but on this being produced, it seems to me that he should grant the certificate, and leave the question either of the paternity, or any other, to be raised by the French Government, if at all.

Earl Cowley may perhaps be instructed in this sense; and the Consul should report on the case, and should also explain to Mr. Casaubon what is requisite on his part in order to enable him to receive the requisite Consular certificate, as otherwise the matter may be further complicated, and Mr. Casaubon's claim jeopardized on some merely formal defect or impediment.

---

* See further Report, page 53.

I must, however, observe that the case, as it stands, is imperfect. The Consul has refused the certificate for some unexplained reason, and this point requires clearing up.

If there are any instructions or precedents applicable to this class of cases, or any apprehension of a serious legal discussion or dispute with the French Government on the point, further and full information must be supplied; especially, if possible, as to the point on which the French Government may probably rely; as for instance (possibly) the father being domiciled in France, and the son being a minor by the French law.

All I can say at present, is, that if Mr. Casaubon's statement of facts is supported by reasonable proof, I see no reason why the Consul should not grant him a certificate of his being a British subject, and the Consul must fully and distinctly explain the grounds of his refusal.

Codicil of Miss Caroline Cooper's will respecting property at Jerusalem.

Doctors' Commons, February 22, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Jerusalem (No. 5), applying for instructions as to the course he should pursue with regard to certain steps which the legal managers in London of the estate of the late Miss Caroline Cooper desire him to take with respect to a codicil to that lady's will which was found in Jerusalem, and which refers to her property at that place; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be sent to Mr. Finn on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Consul Finn's statements are not sufficiently explanatory of the circumstances, or of the legal position of the deceased's succession, to enable me to deal satisfactorily with the case. He sends no copy of the application which he has received from those whom he calls "the legal managers in London of the estate of the late Miss Cooper." He gives no dates (not even that of the death of the testatrix) or facts; nor does he make any reference to any former occurrences or correspondence in this matter. He does not even give the names or addresses of the legal "managers," and he does not explain whether they are the executors of a will of deceased, of which an English probate has been already obtained, or in what character or by what legal right they are acting. He does not state material facts which must be within his knowledge; as (for instance) the purport or contents of the codicil in question (the original being in his custody), the amount or condition of the deceased's property (if any) in his Consulate, the real reason of his hesitation or delay in sending home this codicil. He does not suggest for the adoption or sanction of your Lordship any different course, or any alternative; and although he states (doubtless with perfect truth), that the Consulate at Jerusalem has "not been in the habit of proving and registering wills," he does not state in what right or capacity he has taken and kept posssession of this codicil, or what he proposes to do with it.

If Her Majesty's Government has the means of discovering who are, in effect, "the legal managers" of the deceased's estate, the matter should be placed at once in the hands of the Queen's Proctor, who should communicate with them, and ascertain how the facts actually stand with reference to the deceased's personal estate and effects; he should thereupon place the facts before me for my advice.

If this cannot be done, the suggestion which occurs to me as most likely to lead to any useful or practical result, is, that the Consul should be instructed forthwith to transmit to the Foreign Office by a safe channel:

1. The original codicil.

I

2. The affidavit required by the applicants, which may be made before Her Majesty's Consul at Jaffa, as suggested by him.

3. All the papers and correspondence of whatever description, including the letter of the "legal managers."

The papers may, when they arrive, be placed in the hands of the Queen's Proctor, who may thereupon be instructed to consult and settle with me as to what should be done. It would seem as if the Consul had no instructions whatsoever as to how he is to proceed in cases of British subjects dying in his Consulate, and his becoming possessed of their papers and effects. Upon this subject I must request further information.

I consider it my duty to point out that the Consul's letter is not such an ordinary business-like letter as the agent (say) of a London merchant would be expected to write to his principal in a similar case; and that not only Her Majesty's Service cannot be properly carried on, but that the interests of Justice may suffer serious detriment, unless Consuls (more especially in legal cases, and from distant stations) write their despatches with ordinary fulness, accuracy, and ability; stating all the most material and pertinent facts of the particular case, with proper specification of names, addresses, and dates. But more especially when they refuse to perform, or hesitate in performing, ordinary and formal acts of a legal character, at the request of those who are apparently the proper parties, they should set forth fully the grounds and reasons of such their refusal or hesitation; such as (for instance) what risk or injury may, in their apprehension, thereby accrue to the property or interests of all concerned, to the rights or interests of Her Majesty, or to their official or personal interests.

By needlessly delaying such acts, they often, doubtless with the best intentions, cause a very serious practical mischief.

Capture of British ship "Louisa" by Spanish guarda-costa.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 23, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying papers* relative to the recent capture, by a Spanish guarda-costa, of a British vessel named the "Louisa," bound from Gibraltar to Tetuan, and the subsequent confiscation of the vessel and her cargo by the Spanish authorities at Algeçiras; and to request that we would take this matter into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon, and as to whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in having recourse to reprisals against the Spanish Government.

We are also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letters of the 12th, 16th (this letter transmitting the sentence of the Court of Algeciras in the case of the "Louisa"), and 18th February instant, transmitting further information upon this subject.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 14th February instant, transmitting a letter and inclosures from the War Office, containing further information with regard to the case of the "Louisa."

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it appears from the additional papers supplied to us, and particularly from the sentence of the Court at Algeciras, that the British vessel "Louisa" has been captured and condemned by the Spanish authorities, on the ground of having been found within Spanish waters without proper papers, and under circumstances which warranted a conclusion that a violation of the Revenue Laws of Spain was intended by the persons having charge of her. If these alleged facts were substantiated by evidence, it would follow that the Spanish Court had jurisdiction, and that the condemnation was justifiable.

* Sir A. Buchanan, Nos. 35 and 55; War Office, February 1 and 9, 1861.

The proceedings of the Spanish Court appear, from the copy of the sentence, to have been formal and regular; and if the conclusions of fact which are there stated are correctly deduced from the evidence, there can be no doubt of the case being within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. From that sentence the owners and captain of the "Louisa" have appealed to the Appeal Court in Spain; and pending that appeal, there is no ground for intervention by the British Government. The decision of the Appeal Tribunal must be awaited.

It is true that there is, in our opinion, strong reason to believe that the vessel was not in Spanish waters at the time of the capture; and, of course, upon this fact the whole question depends: for if not in Spanish waters the Spanish Court has no jurisdiction, and any inquiry into the acts or intentions of the persons in charge of the vessel would become immaterial. We recommend, therefore, that the question of the actual position of the vessel at the time of the capture should be made the subject of the most accurate investigation by the British authorities at Gibraltar; and if any additional grounds or evidence can be discovered (besides the evidence given in the cause) satisfactorily proving that the vessel was not in Spanish waters at the time of the capture, a strong representation on the subject may be made to the Spanish Government. But, at present, as we see no ground for impeaching the regularity of the judicial proceedings, we cannot recommend that any strong measures should be resorted to.

Suspension of authority of United States' Customs officers at Charleston.

Doctors' Commons, February 23, 1861.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th of January ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying despatches and inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington,* relative to the suspension of the authority of the United States' Customs officers at Charleston, in South Carolina.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that your Lordship had approved the conduct of Her Majesty's Minister and of Mr. Consul Bunch, as reported in those despatches; and that your Lordship had caused copies of Consul Bunch's despatch to Lord Lyons of January 7th ultimo, and of the certificate which he proposed to issue to British and foreign vessels clearing at the port of Charleston for British ports, to be communicated to the British and Colonial Custom-house authorities for their information.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take these certificates into our consideration, and that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the propriety of Her Majesty's Consul issuing these documents; and he was also pleased to request that we would peruse the note from Judge Black of January 10, and the printed papers which he delivered to Lord Lyons, and favour your Lordship with such observations as we might have to offer upon them; and also as to how far the cases of the "Georgiana" and "Lizzie Thompson" appear to us to apply to the circumstances at Charleston, with regard to which Her Majesty's Minister had requested information as to the intentions of the Government of Washington.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report, that we are of opinion that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the British Consul may properly issue the certificates in question.

We do not perceive that the cases alluded to of the "Georgiana" and "Lizzie Thompson," have any immediate bearing on the propriety of the Consul's issuing these certificates.

It is obviously requisite that a distinct understanding should be arrived at with the Federal Government of the United States as to the course which that Government will adopt with respect to British vessels clearing from ports in States of the Confederation where there are either no Custom-house officers whatsoever, or where there are not any Federal Custom-house officers.

We do not consider that the suggestion of the Custom-house, that the masters of vessels may insert "America" [sic] under the head "Port or Place from whence they arrive," in the Report, under sec. 50 of 16 & 17 Vict., cap. 107, would satisfy the intention of the Act or meet the requirements of the case. "The United States of North America," should be the form of the entry; "America" is a simple geographical expression, like "Europe," "Asia," or "Africa."

SPAIN AND VENEZUELA.

Responsibility for losses occasioned to Spanish subjects by acts of Venezuelan insurgents.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th November last, stating that with reference to the Report of Her Majesty's Advocate-General, dated the 4th of September last, he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Mr. Orme (No. 91) respecting a discussion which has arisen between the Governments of Spain and of Venezuela, owing to a demand made by the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires in Venezuela, that the Venezuelan Government should undertake the responsibility for losses occasioned to Spanish subjects in Venezuela by the acts of persons being insurgents against the authorities in that country.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to transmit to us the papers bearing on this subject, and a draft of a despatch which your Lordship has addressed to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, in reply to an inquiry made by the French Government as to the views of Her Majesty's Government on this subject; and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the extent to which the Venezuelan Government can be held responsible for injuries inflicted on property, or persons, of British subjects, or other foreign subjects, in Venezuela, in the circumstances referred to in this correspondence.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions, we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the responsibility (if any) of the Venezuelan Government for injuries inflicted on the property or persons of British subjects, or other foreign subjects, in Venezuela, is not affected by the Decree of the 6th March, 1854, declaring the Republic exempt from the obligation to make good to foreigners the damages and losses which their property may suffer, in consequence of political commotions, &c. Such obligation, if it exist, is based on international rights, which it is not competent to any State to abrogate by its own legislation.

As a matter, however, of international right, we do not think that the Venezuelan Government can be held responsible generally for injuries inflicted on the property or persons of British subjects, or other foreigners, resident in the country, by insurgents engaged in open and armed hostility to the Government; and which injuries the Government had not the power to prevent. A foreigner cannot claim to be placed in a better situation than the natural-born subjects of the country. If the country be invaded by an enemy, and the foreigner's property is injured by the invading army, he has no title to claim compensation. Injury caused by insurgents or rebels is subject to the same rule. If, indeed, the Government, having the power to do so, neglects or wilfully abstains from putting down the insurgents, it may be regarded as an accomplice in the act complained of, and there would be a right in the foreigner to demand compensation.

In the case before us, we find no sufficient ground for alleging that the injuries complained of would not have occurred but for gross neglect on the part of the Venezuelan Government; and we do not think, therefore, that the facts, as far as we can ascertain them, would justify a demand of compensation.

With regard to the additional papers, they relate entirely to the claim of Messrs. Hartman for compensation for the loss of some houses forcibly taken by certain officials; and if the case be as stated by Mr. Hartman, the Government of Venezuela has agreed to pay, and Messrs. Hartman have consented to accept, 1,000 dollars in satisfaction of their claim, but which the Government says it is at present unable, through poverty, to discharge. Messrs. Hartman do not believe in this inability, because other claims of a similar nature have been paid.

We can say no more than that if Her Majesty's Consul is satisfied that the plea of the Government is a false one, he should be instructed to make a strong representation on the part of Her Majesty's Government as to the propriety of immediate payment being made.

Consular jurisdiction over Ionians in Ottoman dominions.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 21st January ultimo, stating that he was directed to acquaint us that your Lordship communicated to the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department copies of our Report of the 31st of October last, on the reference made to us respecting the exercise by Her Majesty's Consuls of jurisdiction over citizens of the Ionian States in the Ottoman dominions.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that the observations which it has occurred to the Duke of Newcastle to offer on those Reports, are set forth in the inclosed letter from the Colonial Office, dated December 31, 1860, and that his Grace desires that our especial attention should be directed to two specific questions therein. The former papers were also inclosed for reference.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to add, that your Lordship has no personal bias in regard to the manner in which jurisdiction should be exercised by Her Majesty's Consuls in the Levant over citizens of the Ionian States, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; that your Lordship is indifferent on the subject, and perfectly prepared to adopt any course which, in our opinion, can legally and properly be adopted; and is only desirous that the obligations incumbent on the British Crown in virtue of concessions made or to be made by the Porte, should be strictly fulfilled with the utmost consideration that circumstances may admit of, for the fair and reasonable rights and pretensions of the citizens of the Ionian States.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to add, that it appears by a despatch received from the Lord High Commissioner, that an early decision of the question, as far as Her Majesty's Government is concerned, is a matter of great urgency, and that your Lordship directed him to request that the subject might have our earliest consideration.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions, we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we have severally expressed on previous occasions our opinions on this subject so fully that, although unable entirely to concur with the reasoning contained in Sir F. Rogers' letter of December 31, 1860, and although we see nothing to induce us to alter those opinions, we propose at present to confine ourselves to answering the two questions put to us in that letter.

The first of those questions, whether Her Majesty, if authorized by Treaty with the Turkish Government, and by Act of the Ionian Parliament, would be legally competent to invest the British Consular Court, or any officer or branch of that Court, with the power of determining, according to Ionian law (modified, of course, by the custom of the Levant), civil and criminal cases in which the Ionians are respectively defendants and accused, must be answered in the affirmative; save that the criminal law to be administered must not be modified by "the custom of the Levant," if, indeed, such custom has any application to criminal cases.

In answer to the second question, what authority beyond the existing Treaties it would be requisite to obtain from the Turkish Government for this purpose, we can only say that any legal and irrevocable public document emanating from the Sultan, whether called firman, capitulation, or by whatever name, empowering Her Majesty, in general terms, to apply and administer to any British-protected subjects, by her Consular officers, whatever law, civil or criminal, she may think proper, will suffice for the purpose in question.

Refusal of Lord Cowley to permit Mr. C. Zwinger to be married in Embassy chapel.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 27, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Charles Zwinger, complaining of the refusal of Lord Cowley to allow him to be married in the chapel of the British Embassy at Paris; together with a despatch from Lord Cowley (No. ~~173~~) explaining what had passed on the subject, and the motives of the course which he adopted in this instance.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state, that Lord Cowley refers, in explanation, to a correspondence which passed in 1858, and of which the instructions to his Excellency were framed on my Report of the 9th September of that year; and to request that I would take the matter into consideration, and report my opinion as to the instructions, if any, which should be sent to Lord Cowley, and the answer which should be returned to Mr. Zwinger.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to add, with reference to a passage in Lord Cowley's despatch, that his Excellency, when he wrote it, was not apprized of the view taken in the instructions to Lord Howard de Walden on the subject of naturalized British subjects, which was settled a short time ago with the Law Officers, but that it is your Lordship's intention to communicate a copy of that instruction generally to all Her Majesty's Ministers abroad, for their information and guidance.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, as at present advised, I am of opinion that Earl Cowley should be instructed to allow the marriage in question to be solemnized at the British Embassy, if this is still desired by Mr. Zwinger; taking care that the bride is previously informed that Mr. Zwinger may be considered legally as a Swiss citizen, as well as a naturalized British subject; and that the legal validity of the marriage may be open to doubt in Switzerland, France, and elsewhere out of England; and recommending her to be previously married in the French Civil form.

If, after this warning, she still desires to be married at the Embassy, I see no sufficient reason why this should not be done.

Mr. Zwinger may be informed to this effect.

I observe that Earl Cowley's despatch of August 14, 1858, and my Report of the 9th September, 1858, were confined to cases where one of the parties was a French subject, which is not the case here. Both parties are British subjects, and there is no suggestion that their future domicil is to be out of England; the risk to be guarded against (which is pointed out in the above papers) is therefore not so immediate and obvious, nor is the conflict of law so direct, as where one of the parties (especially the husband) is a French subject, and the contemplated domicil is probably French.

On the other hand, Mr. Zwinger, whether as a British subject or as a Swiss citizen, may (as not being a Frenchman) meet with some difficulty or delay in contracting a French Civil marriage.

Detention at Constantinople of goods consigned to Mr. Pappa by Messrs. Giannacopulo and Co. Complaint against Consular Court.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 26, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th February instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying letters from Mr. Daniel Pappa and from Messrs. Giannacopulo and Cochilani, complaining of the proceedings of the Consular Court at Constantinople with regard to the detention by the Custom-house at that port of certain goods consigned to Mr. Pappa by Messrs. Giannacopulo and Cochilani.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to transmit a despatch from Mr. Hornby, reporting the circumstances connected with the detention of those goods, and stating the course which he had pursued in the matter; and to request that we would take these papers into our consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That there is no ground for the detention by the officers of the Custom-house at Constantinople of the goods in question; and that the grounds for such detention, which have been set up, are wholly insufficient. There seems to be no pretence for the allegation that the goods are the property of Mr. Cartali, and, that being so, the circumstance that they once belonged to him, and bear his mark, is, of course, immaterial.

A representation to this effect should, we would suggest, be made to the Turkish Government, who should also be distinctly informed by Sir H. Bulwer that no impediment to the delivery up of the goods to the claimant exists on the part of the Consular Court, or owing to any proceedings therein.

UNITED STATES.

Claim of Administrator-General of New York to take possession of effects of British seamen dying on board a British ship on the high seas.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, February 27, 1861.*

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Board of Trade dated the 5th February, inclosing a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at New York, relative to a claim put forward by the Administrator-General of the property of deceased persons in that State to take possession of the effects of British seamen dying on board a British ship on the high seas, when those effects come within his jurisdiction; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That I observe (in the first place) that the Consul states that he has not hitherto been interfered with "in carrying out the instructions of the

---

* See further Report, page 49.

1861

Merchant Shipping Act ;" I presume that the Consul means the instructions issued by the Board of Trade with reference to this Act ; and I need scarcely observe that neither the Act nor the instructions can affect the operation of the local law of New York. " Extra territorium jus dicenti impunè non paretur."

Secondly. There is no copy, with the papers, of the particular law of the State of New York under which the public Administrator now claims to act as suggested ; nor is it stated whether this is a recent law, or whether it has long been the law of New York, or how or why it has happened that the Consul has, notwithstanding this law, not been hitherto interfered with.

Thirdly. Nothing is stated as to the law or practice in similar cases in the other maritime States of the (former) " United States ;" such, for instance, as Massachusetts, the Carolinas, Pennsylvania. Louisiana. Without full information on this subject, it is not possible to deal with the question in a satisfactory manner, even as regards New York.

Fourthly. The Board of Trade states that the law of the State of New York applicable to this class is, though perhaps not contrary to International Law, at any rate " contrary to the common practice of maritime nations." It is certainly not contrary to International Law, but as I am unfortunately not well informed on the practice of maritime nations on the point, I should much desire accurate information as to what is the law, and also the common practice of the principal maritime nations in this respect, say Russia, France, Spain, and Holland.

Fifthly. I more particularly desire to know what is the law and practice in such cases of the Principal British possessions, such, for instance, as Scotland, British India, the Australian, North American, and West Indian Colonies. I am aware that in India, in some of the Australian Colonies, and in British Guiana, for instance, the system of " Official Administration " exists, which works well ; but I know not what is done as to the effects of foreign seamen. The principal question is, " Are foreign Consuls in any, and which, foreign countries or British possessions. legally authorized or practically allowed (in the absence of express Treaty stipulations) to administer officially, and without reference to the ordinary tribunals, to the effects of foreign seamen dying on board foreign merchant ships at sea, or in harbour, either in all cases without exception, or in the absence of any person legally entitled to administer, or how otherwise ?"

Sixthly. In England, as a matter of strict law, the United States Consul would probably be refused administration, even limited to paying the debts, and collecting and transmitting the effects of a citizen of the United States dying in this country ; and even in the absence of any heirs. (See Aspinwall against the Queen's Proctor, 2 Curteis' Ecclesiastical Reports, page 241.) I am not aware of any exception in the case of foreign seamen dying at sea, in foreign merchant-vessels arriving in British ports.

Lastly. The general question involved is a large one, and of some practical importance. The Consul gives but a short statement of the law and the facts. If he has any chance, by any legal proceeding, of keeping matters in the channel in which they have hitherto remained, he may be instructed to attempt such proceeding under the best professional advice ; if not, the general question must be considered, and the necessary information collected with a view to the full consideration of the propriety of international stipulation, accompanied by an alteration of the English and Colonial law and practice on the subject ; which will not be unattended with difficulty. Reciprocity will probably be required by foreign nations, and the English Courts and jurisprudence have hitherto refused altogether to recognize foreign Consuls as having any locus standi in curia in their official capacity, in this or any other class of cases. Her Majesty's Government has, nevertheless, by special Treaty stipulation, secured in many countries peculiar privileges in this respect to British Consuls.

An alteration of our national system of jurisprudence on this subject, whilst it might have some advantages, would be attended with no small practical difficulty. (a.) The securing anything like uniformity in fresh legislation on this subject throughout the British possessions would be by no means an easy task. (b.) Even if this uniformity were secured, the recognition of Consuls as " Official Administrators " to the effects of those under their protection dying, or leaving effects within British jurisdiction, would necessarily involve the entire subjection and accountability of such Consuls to the ordinary tribunals, at the suit of any private person " having an interest" (say, for instance, a creditor) ; and the determination and effect with which certain English tribunals would enforce their jurisdiction might lead to inconvenient international discussions.

The Court of Chancery, for instance, would probably, without hesitation, commit to prison for " contempt " any foreign Consul who assumed to act in violation of its orders, whether from any supposed exemption, by instructions from his own Government, from a feeling of official dignity or duty, or otherwise howsoever ; and the consequences of such judicial proceedings might be, at least, inconvenient internationally.

The general question is, therefore, one for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. As to the particular question either with (the so-called) " United States' Federal Government," or with the " State of New York," the matter is at present scarcely ripe for decision, from want of full information ; of course it may be found practicable to make a peculiar stipulation and alteration of the English law limited to the case of foreign seamen, and in return for reciprocal privileges ; but in many cases (as I have pointed out) Her Majesty's Government has acquired by Treaty (and I presume practically exercises) the right in question, as to seamen, in common with other British subjects.

I would beg to refer, in connection with this subject, to the Report of the Law Officers of the 11th January, 1861, on the subject of the Portuguese Consul's claim to a privilege of this kind in British Guiana.

The Queen's Advocate to Lord J. Russell.—(Received February 28.)

Doctors' Commons, February 28, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd February instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the draft of a letter which your Lordship proposes should be addressed to the Admiralty, with reference to the impression which Captain Aldham. the Senior Officer in the Gulf of Mexico, seems to have derived from a perusal of my Report of the 20th May, 1857 (New Granada), that " the institution of a blockade for the purpose of obtaining claims [sic] is illegal, without a declaration of war."

GENERAL.

Institution of a blockade for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction for claims without declaration of war.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a copy of that Report, as well as Captain Aldham's letter to the Admiralty, and to request that I would take the inclosed draft into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether, in my opinion, it is right and proper.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That subject to a slight alteration which I have made in the draft letter to the Admiralty, I am of opinion that it is right and proper.

I beg to observe that the words " without a declaration of war," are Captain Aldham's, and not mine ; and that the existence of war (which is in my opinion necessary to the international validity of a blockade) may legally and actually be apparent without any formal declaration of war, as I have fully explained in my recent Report of January 21st, upon the international view indirectly suggested by the French Government as that which might be taken of the Sardinian blockade of Gaeta.

I would, in connection with this subject, also beg to refer to the Report of Sir J. Dodson, dated August 25, 1846, on the destruction of certain vessels in the port of Ensenada, during the (so-called) blockade of Buenos Ayres by the British and French squadrons. See also Hautefeuille, " Droits et Devoirs des Nations Neutres," vol. iii, p. 182 : " Le blocus * * est donc un acte de guerre, il ne peut exister sans la guerre " (cited and adopted in " Wheaton's Elements, sixth edition, by Lawrence, p. 587, note) ; and p. 183, " Depuis les anciens Traités jusqu'à nos jours, il n'en existe pas un seul qui ne se soit servi des expressions ' belligérant,' ' ennemi,' ' neutre,' et dont l'ensemble des dispositions n'indique clairement que le blocus est un acte de guerre, et ne peut exister que pendant la guerre."

1861

The important difference, as regards the international validity of a blockade, between the existence of war and the existence of a declaration of war (which has escaped the attention of Captain Aldham) will be, I trust, apparent to your Lordship.

It may, perhaps, be advisable to communicate this Report to the Admiralty, for the assistance of naval officers in the discharge of their difficult and responsible duties in this respect.

Proposed Draft to the Secretary to the Admiralty.

Sir, Foreign Office, March , 1861.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S attention has been attracted by a statement in Captain Aldham's despatch of the 7th of December last, of which a copy was transmitted to this Office in your letter of the 23rd of January, from which it would seem that Captain Aldham considers Her Majesty's Advocate-General to have stated that, in his opinion, "the institution of a blockade for the purpose of obtaining claims is illegal, without a declaration of war."

The Report of Her Majesty's Advocate-General to which Captain Aldham refers is supposed to be that of May 20, 1857, on the instruction given to Sir Houston Stewart to enforce, by means of blockade, the payment of British claims on the Government of New Granada, of which Report a copy was transmitted to the Admiralty on the 28th of May, 1857.

Lord John Russell directs me to request that you will acquaint the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that he does not understand the opinion of the Queen's Advocate to go to the extent of pronouncing that a previous declaration of war is essential to the validity of a blockade:* the enforcement of it requires or implies the actual existence of a state of war between the Government establishing a blockade and the Government against whose ports it is established.

Alterations suggested by the Queen's Advocate:

† After "remarks" insert "in that case"

‡ After "namely" insert "proceedings in the nature of"

§ For "to reprisals was" read "thereto was in that case"

‖ For "could" read "need necessarily"

In the case which was then before the Queen's Advocate, no such state of war existed; and the object of the Queen's Advocate's remarks† was to show that there was another method of obtaining redress for claims when differences between countries had not been pushed to the length of war, namely,‡ reprisals; and that recourse [to reprisals was §] the preferable measure, inasmuch as no question [could ‖] arise with third Powers out of the exercise of them.

I am, &c.

* Addition suggested by the Queen's Advocate:—

"There is no statement to this effect in the above Report. The Queen's Advocate states, in effect, that, as against neutrals, and having regard to the English legal doctrine and practice as to captures and prize-proceedings, the right of blockade is, in strictness, a 'belligerent right,' founded upon 'the existence of war' (to which a declaration of war is not, by international law, a necessary preliminary, or 'condition precedent'). He intended to express his opinion, and he seems to have expressed it with sufficient clearness, that blockade, being a 'belligerent right,'"

Income tax levied by Indian Government on Persian subjects.
Increase of Customs duties in India on Persian merchandize.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 6, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 25th day of February last, in which he states that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying letters from the Persian Ambassador at this Court, the one complaining that the Government of India had signified to all Persian subjects, including merchants, that they must out of their profits pay annually a tax of 4 per cent. to the British Government; the other, that the Government of India was enforcing on some of the Persian merchandizes higher Custom duties than were formerly levied upon them.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a letter from the India Office, explaining the circumstances under which the taxes referred to by the Persian Ambassador were being levied, and requested that we would take these papers into our consideration, and report to your Lordship whether, in our opinion, there is anything in the Treaty between this country and Persia to exempt Persian subjects in India from the payment of the taxes in question?

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the above letters into our consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That there is nothing whatever in the Treaty between this country and Persia which exempts Persian subjects from the payment of the income tax, or in any manner restricts the right of the Indian Government to impose any tax on Persian subjects, which is also imposed on all other foreigners. With respect to the Customs duties levied on Persian goods imported into India, we observe the statement contained in the letter of Sir Charles Wood of the 22nd ultimo, that they are the same duties which are levied on the goods of other foreigners, and also on the goods of British subjects when imported into India.

Persian subjects, therefore, cannot have any title to complain.

Petition from Signor Margariti for interference of British Government in case of Margariti v. Vlassopulo, heard before Her Majesty's Consul at Galatz.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 5, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the Colonial Office, inclosing the draft of an answer which his Grace the Duke of Newcastle proposes to return to a despatch from the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, inclosing a petition from Signor Margariti, asking for the interference of Her Majesty's Government in the case of "Margariti v. Vlassopulo," adjudicated by the late Mr. Consul Cunningham, Her Majesty's Consul at Galatz.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose a copy of a Confidential Memorandum on the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Consuls over Ionian subjects in Turkey, referred to by Sir H. Storks, which contains a précis of this case, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which the Duke of Newcastle proposes to return to Sir H. Storks.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

Consular jurisdiction over Ionians in the Levant.

That we regret to find that there is still so much misapprehension and error upon the subject of the jurisdiction which Her Majesty's Consuls have the power to exercise over Ionians in the Levant.

We have frequently stated our opinion that Her Majesty has no power, either under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, or by capitulation with the Porte, to administer in the Levant any other than English law, modified by the custom of the Levant. Her Majesty has no power by her Judges or Consuls to administer Ionian law, either civil or criminal.

To enable Her Majesty's Consuls to administer Ionian law, three things will be required:—

1st. An Act of the Ionian Legislature giving such authority to Her Majesty.

2ndly. A Capitulation with the Porte, expressly assenting to the Crown administering Ionian law within the Ottoman dominions.

1861

3rdly. An Order in Council conferring jurisdiction and authority on the Consuls, and prescribing rules of procedure.

With respect to the trial and sentence of Vlassopulo we find no reason for imputing any serious error to Mr. Consul Cunningham.

It is true that the term "fraudulent bankruptcy" is not the correct technical appellation of any crime in English criminal jurisprudence, but there are many acts and defaults by a bankrupt which are "misdemeanours" by English law, and some of which are generally found in every case of "fraudulent bankruptcy." But it is very difficult to ascertain from the petition of Mr. Margariti what is intended by this term. He represents that having commissioned Vlassopulo to to purchase for him a quantity of wheat, and having (as we infer) remitted him 6,000 dollars for the purpose, Vlassopulo purchased the wheat, but afterwards, by devising a "fraudulent bankruptcy," he (Vlassopulo) not only sacrificed petitioner (Margariti) of his considerable capital of above 6,000 dollars, but also of the cargo of wheat itself, &c.

It is difficult to derive from this loose statement any precise information, but, at all events, we are of opinion that the case was not a criminal case "of a serious nature" within the meaning of the Consular instructions of 1845, so as to require the transmission of the accused to Corfu for trial.

We are also clearly of opinion that Vlassopulo cannot now be sent to Ionia, as requested by Margariti, for the purpose of being again tried and punished by Ionian law.

We approve of the letter proposed to be written by the Duke of Newcastle to Sir H. Storks.

Proposal from Moldavian Government to that of the Ionian Islands, respecting right of natives to hold land.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 5, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th of February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying papers on the subject of a proposal recently made by the Government of Moldavia to that of the Ionian Islands, for establishing a reciprocity of rights between the natives of either country in the holding of land, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration; and that, with reference to the Treaty placing the Ionian Islands under the protection of this country, and to the constitution of the Ionian Islands, we would report to your Lordship our opinion with respect to the proceedings of the Ionian Government in this matter, and whether Her Majesty's Government would do right to concur in those proceedings.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That we are of opinion that, subject to the remark hereinafter made, the proceedings of the Ionian Government, in the matter of the establishment of a reciprocity of rights of succession between the natives of the Ionian Islands and Moldavia are regular, and within the Constitutional authority of that Government, and that Her Majesty's Government will do right to concur in those proceedings.

By the 18th and 19th Articles of the Ionian Code every foreigner is to enjoy in the Ionian States the same civil rights as the nation he belongs to accords to Ionian subjects, and the foreigner is to be at once put in possession and enjoyment of these rights from the day on which the nation to which he belongs shall have proclaimed, by an official declaration, that it will grant a reciprocity to Ionian subjects.

The functions of the Ionian Government, therefore, in the matter are merely ministerial. All communications from foreign Governments must, of course, be made to the Lord High Commissioner, and may be by him communicated to the Ionian Parliament. If the act of the foreign Government is found, on examination, to be effectual for admitting the natives of Ionia to the full rights of succession, the foreign subject becomes immediately, by force of the Ionian Code, entitled to reciprocal benefits in the Ionian Islands.

In fact, there does not appear to us to be any necessity for the Lord High Commissioner to wait for action by the Ionian Parliament. As soon as the communication of some act by a foreign Government admitting the Ionian to the right of inheritance is received, and found to be effectual by the Lord High Commissioner, such communications may be published, and ipso facto the Ionian law comes into operation.

With regard, however, to the Principalities or States of Moldavia and Wallachia, care must be taken than any act of those States is the act of competent authorities. We are not aware of the existence of any Government in the Principalities competent to hold official communication with any foreign Government, except that of the Sultan.

Presence at Bermuda of an American vessel suspected of being a slaver.

Course to be pursued in the event of vessels (apparently equipped for the Slave Trade) being compelled by stress of weather to put into British colonial ports.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 5, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th February ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying letter from the Colonial Office, inclosing a copy of a despatch from the Governor of Bermuda, reporting the presence in the waters of that colony of an American vessel suspected of being fitted out for the Slave Trade, which had been stranded on some rocks to the north of the island while on a voyage from the United States to the West Coast of Africa; and requesting to be furnished with instructions as to the proper line of conduct to be pursued by the colonial and naval authorities in the event of American vessels (apparently equipped for the Slave Trade) being compelled, by stress of weather or other casualty, to put into the harbours of Bermuda.

Lord Wodehouse also stated that it had been recently ascertained that American slave-vessels have been in the habit of resorting to British waters in the neighbourhood of Her Majesty's West Indian islands, and, in one instance, of making use of Anguilla Island (one of the small uninhabited isles, a dependency of the Bahamas), as a depôt from whence to transship slaves to Cuba. Several vessels had also been recently found "derelict" in British waters, having been abandoned by their crews, after having either landed their slaves in Cuba, or transshipped them to small coasting-vessels, for greater convenience of landing them in that island; that two other vessels had also within the last few months been stranded in British waters: in one case the slaves were carried into Nassau, the chief port of the Bahamas, where they had been liberated; and in the other case the master of the vessel seized the boat belonging to an English lighthouse, and also some small fishing vessels, and by their aid landed his slaves on an uninhabited British cay, where they remained whilst the master proceeded to Cuba and procured assistance, which enabled him to remove the slaves to that island.

Lord Wodehouse was pleased to say that the papers relating to those circumstances were also annexed, and that he was to request that we would take the papers transmitted to us into our consideration and favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the instructions which it may be proper to send to the Governor of Bermuda, and also to the Governors of other British Colonies in the West Indies, for their guidance in respect to these matters.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers submitted to us into our consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That with respect to foreign vessels, apparently equipped for the Slave Trade, being compelled by stress of weather or other casualty to put into any British harbour, the Colonial authorities will be justified in putting in force against such vessels, or the persons on board, the British laws, whether Imperial or Colonial, actually existing and in force in the Colony, upon such legal evidence of the British law having been actually broken by them within the British territorial limits, as the Colonial Law Officers may consider sufficient to justify the commencement of proceedings in each case; but not under any other circumstances.

Foreign vessels, and those on board them, must be considered as innocent until sufficient legal primâ facie proof of their guilt is forthcoming.

The Colonial authorities must, in this sense, understand that they proceed against such vessels, or those on board, as it were "at their peril;" and although it will be their duty so to proceed whenever the Law Officers advise them that there is legal justification for so doing, yet they must not in such cases act merely on their own suspicions or opinions, but only under competent legal advice: the Slave Trade not being legally piracy jure gentium, nor of itself an offence against the Law of Nations.

With reference to the cases in which slaves have been transshipped within British territory, either in British waters or on uninhabited British islands or cays, or landed for the purpose of transshipment, or (as in one case) where the boats belonging to a lighthouse on a British island or British fishing-vessel, have been seized by a slaver, they can only be met by the providing a sufficient force and exercising sufficient vigilance to prevent the British territory being thus invaded and made the theatre of crimes against British law. All slaves found within the British territorial jurisdiction should be liberated; and the vessels, and free persons used for keeping them in slavery, if found in British territory acting as slave-owners or "slavers," should be detained in custody, and instantly delivered up to the nearest British authority, to be dealt with according to law under the advice of the Crown Lawyers.

With respect to slave-vessels found wrecked or "derelict," or brought within British jurisdiction by salvors or otherwise, we see no reason for suggesting any special instructions; they must be dealt with by the local law as other "wrecks and derelicts."

Rules of practice to be observed in judicial proceedings before Her Majesty's Consul.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Yeddo, inclosing copies of the rules of practice to be observed in judicial proceedings before Her Majesty's Consuls in Japan, published under the Order in Council of March 1859.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that Mr. Alcock explains, that those issued under the more recent Order of January 1860, are identical. Copies of the Port Regulations hitherto sanctioned for the ports of Hakodadi and Kanagawa, were inclosed; and Mr. Hammond further stated that these copies of Rules and Regulations were forwarded to me for my own use, but that your Lordship would be glad to receive my observations, should I have any to offer, in regard to them.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as Consul Alcock states that the "Rules of Practice" were adopted from those already existing in China, which had been previously sanctioned by the legal advisers of the Colonial Government of Hong Kong, and had been there found, upon experience, to work well; and as he says nothing as to any difficulties or defects whatever in their practical operation in Japan, I abstain from any suggestions thereon, for which, moreover, I have no materials.

Possibly, however, it might be desirable to furnish the Consul with a copy of the Consular Rules for Turkey (30th November, 1860), and of Mr. Hornby's "Circular letter" to the Consuls thereupon, for his guidance hereafter; inasmuch as if there should be a large increase in Japan of British population and trade, additional Rules will probably be required, especially with reference to a despatch of Consul Alcock's No. 38, June 1, 1860, reported on by the Law Officers, October 16, 1860.

Mr. Alcock's attention should, in my opinion, be called to the "Port Regulations," especially to those for Kanagawa, which seem vague and imperfect. Those for Hakodadi are much superior, both in substance and in form; and some approach to a general uniformity should be attempted, where practicable, in these Regulations, in Japan.

On right of British subjects in Surinam to sell estates with slaves attached. Mr. T. M. Parry.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th day of February last, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to state that with reference to his letter of the 9th of October, and to our report of the 7th of November last, on the subject of the legality of the proceedings contemplated by certain British subjects in the Island of Surinam, in selling three estates in that island with slaves attached, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us (together with the former papers), a further despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Surinam, reporting that the executors of the late Mr. Thomas Macdonald Parry had sold an estate in that island, with slaves attached, some of whom were children born since the acquisition of the parents, and who could not, therefore, be said to have come into the possession of the late Mr. Macdonald Parry by inheritance.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that Mr. Monro had warned the executors of the illegality of this sale; and requested us to take this despatch into our consideration, and advise your Lordship as to any steps which it might be proper that Her Majesty's Government should now take in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have perused the papers transmitted to us, and have the honour to report—

That in accordance with the suggestion contained in our report of November 7, 1860, we recommend that the Consul's despatch of January 2, 1861, and the former papers, should be communicated to the Solicitor of the Treasury; and that he should be instructed to take immediate steps for the institution of criminal proceedings against the executors of Mr. Macdonald Parry, and the other parties implicated, if within the jurisdiction of our Courts, provided sufficient legal proof can be obtained to ensure a reasonable prospect of their conviction.

PERSIA.

Request for certain specific privileges to be granted to Persian subjects in India.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th of February last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a note from the Persian Ambassador at this Court, requesting that certain specific privileges might be granted to Persian subjects in India.

Mr. Hammond also inclosed a letter from the India Office, stating the opinion of Secretary Sir Charles Wood upon this claim, and was pleased to request that we would take these papers into our consideration, and report to your Lordship whether there is anything in the Treaty between this country and Persia to entitle Persian subjects in India to enjoy the privileges claimed for them by the Persian Ambassador.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have carefully considered the above question, and have the honour to report that it appears from the letter from the India Office that no foreigners enjoy in India the privileges now claimed by Persia. There is nothing in the Treaty to ensure absolute and complete reciprocity on this head. Articles IX and XII are in the nature of separate "most favoured nation clauses." In other words Persian Consuls are in India only to be treated as Consuls of "most favoured nations" are treated there; and not precisely as British Consuls are treated in Persia.

The answer to your Lordship's question must, therefore, be in the negative.

My Lord,

CHILE.

Question of forwarding legal documents through Foreign Office from foreign Government.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st of February ultimo, in which he stated that, with reference to the opinion of one of us (Her Majesty's Advocate-General), dated the 15th of February ultimo,* respecting the transmission of certain legal documents by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Chile, he was directed by your Lordship to point out to us that Clause 2 of the Statute 19 and 20 Vict., cap. 113, and to which clause your Lordship's attention was called in the above-mentioned opinion, provides that a certificate under the hands of the Ambassador, Minister, or other Diplomatic Agent of any foreign Power, received as such by Her Majesty, or, in case there be no such Diplomatic Agent, those of the Consul-General or Consul of any such foreign Power at London, received and admitted as such by Her Majesty, shall be evidence of the matters so certified; but that nothing is said as to documents being admissible as evidence when transmitted through one of Her Majesty's Legations or Consuls, and that it would appear, therefore, at least in so far as this Statute is concerned, that Her Majesty's Legations and Consuls when requested to transmit home legal documents which relate to any civil or commercial matter pending before a foreign Tribunal, should explain to the foreign Government making such request that such documents should be transmitted through an Agent of their own in this country. And that before, therefore, issuing any instructions on this subject your Lordship would be glad to be favoured with further explanation as to the precise manner in which Her Majesty's Legations and Consuls should be directed to proceed in reference to the Statute above quoted.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this matter into our consideration, and have the honour to report that there is nothing in the Act of the 19th and 20th Vict., cap. 113, to authorise any Ambassador, Chargé d'Affaires, or Consul of Her Majesty in any foreign country to transmit home, at the request of any foreign Government or authority, any legal document relating to a civil or commercial matter pending before a foreign Tribunal.

No such practice must be commenced. Such transmission would not give to the document transmitted any authenticity or character as evidence which it did not possess independently of such transmission, and the act of the Ambassador or Consul would only tend to mislead a foreign Government.

It was the sole intention and object of the Act (which was prepared by the present Attorney-General) to assist litigants before foreign Tribunals in obtaining evidence by the examination of witnesses in this country, and the second section was inserted for the purpose of officially informing the Courts and Judges here of the existence and nature of the foreign suit, and the jurisdiction of the foreign Tribunal to entertain it, as a guide and authority to them in their examination of witnesses in this country. The second section does not relate at all to British officials, but only to the Ambassadors, Ministers, Agents, or Consuls of foreign Powers. There is no necessity under the Act for your Lordship to send any instructions to Her Majesty's Legations or Consuls abroad; except that, being supplied with copies of the Statute, they should be directed to explain the mode of procedure under it, on occasion of any application being made to them on the subjects to which it relates.

One object in bringing forward and passing the Act was to obtain, if possible, on the part of foreign States, similar reciprocal provisions for taking abroad evidence in English suits; and this circumstance should not be forgotten by British Representatives in their communications with foreign Ministers or other authorities.

Sardinian blockade of Messina.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th of March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a note from the Sardinian Minister at this Court, announcing the blockade on the 5th of March instant of the citadel of Messina, by a Sardinian squadron; and to request that, if I should consider this notification to be sufficient, I would draw up and transmit to your Lordship a form of notice for insertion in the "London Gazette" of to-day.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report, that I have accordingly prepared, and herewith transmit, a form of notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

In preparing this notification, I have of course assumed that the Sardinian Minister knows, and means to state, that Admiral Persano did, in fact, blockade the citadel of Messina on the 5th instant, and not merely that this was ordered to be done, or was to have been done, on that day, unless some unforeseen circumstance intervened.

I mention this, because the Sardinian Minister does not state when or how he received information of the actual establishment of this blockade; and not being myself aware of the actual state of telegraphic communication between Messina and London, I am struck with the circumstance of a fact which happened at Messina on the 5th instant being known in London on the 7th instant.

Foreign Office, March 8, 1861.

IT is hereby notified that the Right Honourable Lord John Russell, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has received from his Excellency the Marquis d'Azeglio, the Sardinian Minister in London, an official communication dated the 7th of March instant, stating that the Sardinian Admiral Persano had, on and from the 5th of March instant, established the blockade of the citadel of Messina and of the neighbouring forts, with a number of ships of war sufficient to render this blockade effective.

The Sardinian Minister further states that he is officially informed by the Sardinian Government that the commercial port of the city of Messina is not comprised in this blockade, and that such port, consequently, remains free from blockade and open to trade.

Mr. Acland's claim for costs in re Mirza Dawood v. Aga Mahomed Sadick.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd of February ultimo, stating that having, in accordance with the suggestion contained in my Report of the 1st of February ultimo,* furnished Mr. Acland with a copy of Mr. Alison's despatch, and of its inclosure, respecting the case of Mirza Dawood v. Mahomed Sadick, he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from Mr. Acland in reply, stating the course which he considers should now be taken in regard to this case; and to request that I would take that letter, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the further instructions that should be given to Mr. Alison.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Alison may be instructed in the sense of the "first point" (which I have pencilled) in Mr. Acland's letter of February 30, of which letter a copy should be sent to him. He should simply use his influence and good offices to obtain payment, and should avoid formally compromising Her Majesty's Government in the matter.

As to the "second point" in Mr. Acland's letter, no formal instructions seem requisite. If the Persian Government, or any party in Persia, desires to continue the legal proceedings already instituted at Bombay, or to institute any further or fresh proceedings, it is obvious that they must correspond with Bombay direct, and furnish funds or security for the costs.

Complaint of Mrs. Parry against Mr. Hornby in re Crawford v. Parry.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd of February last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter which your Lordship had received from Mrs. Parry, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Hornby, the Judge in the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, in the case of her husband, who had been arrested, at the suit of Mr. James Crawford, for the non-payment of a sum of money which Mr. Crawford had expended in repairing certain buildings on a farm belonging to Mr. Parry, of which he had taken a lease; and which sum had been decided to be due to Mr. Crawford by a sentence of the Supreme Consular Court.

Mr. Hammond also transmitted a despatch from Mr. Hornby explaining the course pursued by him with regard to this matter; and was pleased to request that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion on the case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have carefully considered the above-mentioned papers, and have the honour to report—

That we think it right that a copy of Mrs. Parry's letter be immediately transmitted to Mr. Hornby, and that he be requested to give specific answers to the statements therein.

We also recommend that Mr. Legal Vice-Consul Wroth be desired to transmit a copy of his notes taken on the trial of Crawford v. Parry, and to report to your Lordship his opinion on the case.

There certainly appears to us to be matter in this case which demands the most serious inquiry.

Mr. Hornby appears to have prepared the lease and contract made between Mr. Parry and Mr. Crawford, and to have acted as their professional adviser. Did he do this gratuitously, and from motives of kindness to strangers (one of whom he represents as a notorious bad character), or did he receive a remuneration? It is most essential that this should be inquired into, as it is quite incompatible with Mr. Hornby's judicial station and duties that he should practise as a private lawyer. Even if he acted gratuitously it was indiscreet in him to mix himself up, as an adviser, with the private transactions of persons which might afterwards come before him judicially.

We have read with regret many expressions in Mr. Hornby's despatch with reference to Mr. and Mrs. Parry, which, in our opinion, are not such as ought to appear in a grave judicial statement of the case; and, on the whole, we think it apparent that Mr. Hornby has so acted in this transaction as to be utterly unfit to fulfil the duty of a Judge as to any question arising out of it.

Claim of Messrs. Schemeil for losses incurred during disturbances in Syria.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's to transmit to letter of the 27th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to me a correspondence between Messrs. Schemeil and the Foreign Office, with reference to their request for the support of Her Majesty's Consul-General at the Beyrout, to their claim on the Ottoman Government to be indemnified for the losses sustained by them in consequence of the recent disturbances in Syria; and report to your to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and Lordship my opinion as to what answer should be returned to Messrs. Schemeil's application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Schemeil do not seem to me to have made out any case for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. I cannot discover any specific loss or damage for which they distinctly seek compensation, excepting that caused by a robbery of cash and jewellery, amounting in value to 2,000*l.*, from their warehouse at Beyrout, on the 23rd January last. This was apparently the act of ordinary robbers, for which the Turkish Government cannot be held responsible.

Their losses by alleged "depreciation of value of goods, and difficulty of getting in outstanding accounts," said to amount to "about 5,000*l.* or 6,000*l.*, are most vaguely alluded to, and cannot be noticed.

Under these circumstances, it is unnecessary to consider the somewhat intricate question of the national character of the several partners, or of the firm.

Complaint of Mr. Harley, master of the "Culloden," for ill-treatment and confinement at Mobile.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 11, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 27th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a Memorial (received through Mr. Horsfall) from Mr. Harley, master of the British ship "Culloden," complaining of his having been illegally seized by a mob, and detained in prison at Mobile, and claiming compensation on that account.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that this case has also been reported by Lord Lyons, whose despatches were inclosed; and to request that I would take the case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which it would be proper to return to Captain Harley.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Harley's Memorial evidently contains a very imperfect and uncandid account of the singular occurrences in question. He admits, however, in paragraph 8, that Anna Macdonald, a passenger in the British vessel, the "Culloden," of which he was master, was, whilst at sea on a voyage from Liverpool to Mobile, unjustifiably assaulted at his instigation, namely, by having water thrown over her by the third mate, by his orders.

It appears, moreover, that on the arrival of the ship at Mobile, complaints, supported by an affidavit, were made by others of the passengers, that Harley had beaten her with a cowhide, and otherwise outrageously ill-treated her: thereupon the newspapers noticed the matter; great public excitement ensued; a public meeting was held, and Mr. Harley was taken out of his hotel by some private persons. It does not appear that he suffered any personal injury; his life was, however, considered to be in danger. The military were called out by the authorities, in order, in effect, to afford him protection, as I understand the circumstances; and with the same view he was placed in prison, howsoever by the warrant of the Acting Consul, and was detained there for twenty-one days, for a portion of that time apparently with his own consent. It was found impossible, owing to the passengers being scattered, to produce any evidence against him; but Anna Macdonald seems to have commenced a civil action against him, in which he found bail; and finally, by the active exertions and contrivance of the Consul, he left the prison unnoticed, and sailed, almost clandestinely, in the "Culloden" for Liverpool, where he has now arrived.

If it should be still in the power of the Emigration Commissioners, or of any Department of Her Majesty's Government, to investigate the case with effect, and either to clear his character, if innocent, or to expose and if possible to punish him, if guilty, this should be done.

The Consul, as is too often the case, omits to forward the depositions which were taken at Mobile, or to give their substance; to give any narrative of the facts as alleged on each side; to state his impression of the real merits of the case; or to give any reason for the extraordinary excitement against Mr. Harley, to which the alleged ill-treatment of Anna Macdonald gave rise at Mobile. He says nothing of this person's character, station, or apparent credibility, or of that of the other passengers; and he is wholly silent as to Mr. Harley's defence or reply to the charges made against him, whatever they may have been.

All these circumstances, and more particularly the Consul's imprisonment and detention of Mr. Harley "by warrant," and the result, if any, of Anna Macdonald's action against Mr. Harley, require further explanation, which should be promptly supplied. Some copies of the "Tribune" newspaper should be forwarded. At present the case is left, as cases are too often left by Consular correspondences, in such a state of obscurity that Her Majesty's Government are without the means, which might so easily have been supplied, of arriving at any definite conclusion.

I observe, however, that Lord Lyons has entirely approved of the Consul's conduct. I observe, moreover, that the Mayor and the local authorities actively exerted themselves to assist and support the Consul, and in effect seem to have saved Mr. Harley from personal danger. Possibly when further information has been received, it may be proper to convey to them the formal acknowledgments of Her Majesty's Government for their conduct in this respect.

With reference to the answer to Mr. Harley's letter, I can only say that my present impression is adverse to him; but the case requires thorough investigation. I can therefore only suggest that he may be informed "that your Lordship has reason to believe that his Memorial contains only an imperfect and partial account of the singular transactions to which he relates; that your Lordship is not at present disposed to comply with his prayer; but that further inquiries will be made on the subject."

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th February ultimo, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 28th January last,* he was directed to transmit to me a further letter from Messrs. Mr. Rohmer's former letter was inclosed for reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

On the question whether a foreign State has a right to interfere with the property of a British subject who has died at sea, in the event of the ship in which he died entering a foreign port.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 13, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 2nd March instant, stating, that with reference to my Report of the 27th February ultimo,† he was directed to request that I would state to your Lordship my opinion whether the fact that a British ship, on board of which a British seaman may have died at sea, and therefore within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, and afterwards enters the port of a foreign State with the property of the deceased on board, gives to the authorities of such foreign State a right to interfere with such property with a view to its administration or disposal; and whether such right would be claimed and could be maintained in this country.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have the honour to report,—

That both these questions must, in the terms in which they are put, be answered in the negative.

These answers may, however, mislead your Lordship, if unaccompanied by explanations.

1st. The "authorities" of foreign countries (if by that phrase is meant the executive authorities) have not, in the case supposed, any right to interfere; but the laws and tribunals of such foreign countries have the exclusive right of determining who is entitled to administer, within their territorial limits, personal property belonging to deceased foreigners which may be locally within such limits, without reference to the place of the deceased's death, or to the law of his "domicil;" which determines the right of succession, but not the right of administration.

This principle is constantly applied in England, as to the administration of the personal property in this country belonging to foreigners dying abroad; and foreign Consuls are not here permitted to act as administrators to their deceased fellow-countrymen, merely by virtue of their office, nor to intermeddle therewith, unless they act regularly by taking out administration, just as any private individual (having an interest) may do. The legal aspect of the question, therefore, must be ascertained before it can be taken up internationally. If, for instance, the law of New York only entitles the Administration to administer to the effects of persons "dying in the State of New York," it has no application to this case. If the Consul was by the law of New York bound to take out administration before he intermeddled with the effects, he has not done so.

Under these circumstances, I consider it necessary to have the text of the particular law of New York adverted to, and a full explanation from the Consul of the ground on which he considers that his acting as administrator in the case of seamen is not in contravention thereof, accompanied by a legal opinion, if necessary, together with the other information suggested in my former Report, as far as it can easily be procured, in order to the due consideration of the case.

SARDINIA.

Mr. W. Taylor's grievances against the authorities of the Island of Monte Cristo.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th of February ultimo, stating that, with reference to my report of the 27th of October last, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Turin (No. 76), inclosing copies of his correspondence with the Sardinian Government upon the subject of Mr. Watson Taylor's grievances against the authorities of the Island of Monte Cristo; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations I might have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as none of the information pointed out as requisite in my previous Report of the 27th of October last is forthcoming, and as the suggestions therein contained appear not to have been followed up, and as I am consequently still without any information whatever as to Mr. and Mrs. Watson's Taylor's previous history, or as to the probable motives of the local authorities in prosecuting them, or of the Governor of Tuscany in authorizing their prosecution, and as no information is forthcoming as to the nature or amount of Mr. Watson Taylor's losses, or of the acts or responsibility of the Sardinian Government or local authorities in respect of those losses, I can only say that the case, as far as I have any information upon it, remains just where it was at the date of my last Report.

I observe that the sentence passed on Mr. and Mrs. Watson Taylor at Porto Ferrajo, on the 5th of September, 1860, was apparently only remitted on the 6th of January, 1861 (see note signed "Cassinis," January 6, 1861, inclosure in Sir J. Hudson's No. 9).

I can find nothing whatever from Mr. Watson Taylor as to the nature or amount or grounds of the pecuniary compensation which he expects or claims. I know not whether he has returned to Monte Cristo, or if not, why not; or what steps he took to protect his property in his absence; or how that property was injured.

In short, either the case itself, or the papers in the case, appear to me to be (perhaps by accident) in a state of partial confusion or imperfection. In Sir J. Hudson's No. 330 it is stated that in August 1860 he made a personal but unofficial representation of the matter to Count Cavour. He seems, however, as far as I can discover, to have made no official written communication whatever on the subject to the Sardinian Government until that dated February 2, 1861 (inclosure No. 1 in No. 76), which he states to be in accordance with your Lordship's No. 19, January 30, 1861. He does not seem to have followed up any of the suggestions in my Report of October 27, 1860, which was sent to him for his use.

I observe that in No. 9, of January 7, 1861, he alludes to a despatch from your Lordship No. 270 of November 23, 1860. I cannot find this despatch (No. 270) with the papers. I see, however, by the letter of Mr. S. Watson Taylor (the brother), dated January 19, 1861, that on November 15, 1860, this gentleman and the complainant had a personal interview with your Lordship, and showed a written Memorial to your Lordship (which document is not now forthcoming). It is probable that this interview and Memorial may have led to the issuing of the (missing) despatch No. 270 (instructions to Sir J. Hudson). However this may be in point of fact I know not; but the practical result would seem to be that the peculiar circumstances of the case have not as yet been distinctly brought to the notice of the Sardinian Government; nor can this be effectually done without further detailed information, at least to some extent, such as is indicated in my Report of October 27, 1860.

The official demand for pecuniary compensation would seem, from all that appears in these papers, to have been made somewhat prematurely, or upon no sufficient data.

It is obvious that a general demand for an apology, and some indemnity by reason of the harsh and unjustifiable criminal proceedings and sentence, is a very different thing from a demand for "compensation for Mr. Taylor's pecuniary losses," arising apparently from "the pillage and destruction of his property" during his absence; upon which latter head I am at present wholly ignorant of the facts and dates.

Upon the whole, therefore, I can only refer to my former Report, and suggest that the whole of Mr. and Mrs. Watson Taylor's case should now be considered as res integra, and a statement of it carefully prepared for formal submission to the Sardinian Government. This can only be effectually done after further communication with Mr. Taylor, Sir J. Hudson, and Vice-Consul Fossi.

The Sardinian Government seems disposed to ignore all the special circumstances, and to treat the case as if it had now been mentioned for the first time. Considering the facts and dates, and bearing in mind that Sir J. Hudson and Mr. Fenton had, in August 1860, personal communication on this case with Count Cavour and Baron Ricasoli (then Governor-General of Tuscany), who had authorized the prosecution, Count Cavour's note of the 10th February, 1861, appears to me very unsatisfactory. There is nothing in it which savours of any general apology, or expression of regret for what has happened. His Excellency assumes Mr. and Mrs. Watson Taylor's guilt, and the entire reasonableness and justice of the proceedings and sentence. He confines himself to the question of compensation; as to which he justly remarks, that there is "nothing from Mr. Taylor himself," and that no sufficient data appear.

The case has at present two separate branches: first, as to the criminal prosecution and sentence; and secondly, as to the damage done to the property.

The amount and nature of the demand to be made, and of the compensation required in each branch, should be considered and settled.

It may, perhaps, be desirable that Sir J. Hudson should be instructed to state officially to Count Cavour, with reference to his Excellency's note of the 10th February ultimo, that further communications would be forthcoming, in due time, on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Grant of special protection to Mr. Rodocanachi, a naturalized British subject, proceeding to Constantinople.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 18, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Reed, requesting that Mr. Rodocanachi, a naturalized British subject, who is about to proceed to Constantinople, may receive special protection on his arrival at that capital, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Reed's application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That the object of Mr. Reed's application is not quite distinctly apparent: he should be asked to explain it more fully, and to furnish a copy of Mr. Rodocanachi's certificate of naturalization, and a statement of his nationality of origin, and of the particular jurisdiction or authority against which he seeks protection at Constantinople, authenticated by that gentleman's own signature.

If this certificate should not give him the rights of a British subject out of the British dominions, and if the real object of this application should only be to procure for him British protection from Turkish jurisdiction, in the general and ordinary sense, whilst at Constantinople for a limited period, to collect his assets for the benefit of his creditors, this should be explained, and your Lordship will consider the application.

If any other or more special "protection" is wanted, this must also be explained. Your Lordship cannot, for instance, enter into any question of "protection" to him as a bankrupt or insolvent against his creditors generally, or against the jurisdiction of the Supreme Consular Court, or otherwise.

Your Lordship must also require some reasonable proof that the creditors consent to, or join in, this application; and Mr. Rodocanachi should make his statement, and should ask for what he wants under his own signature, and not merely by a somewhat vague application from his solicitor, unaccompanied by any documents or vouchers, to which, under the circumstances, your Lordship cannot accede.

An answer to this effect may, subject to your Lordship's approval, be returned to Mr. Reed.

UNITED STATES.

Liability of British subjects to perform military service in the United States.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 18, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 25th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington relative to the question of the liability of British subjects to perform military service in the United States; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my early convenience, my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That as to the general question involved in this case, namely, the liability of foreigners to serve in the militia of any country in which they may be resident, I have already, in conjunction with the Attorney and Solicitor-General, expressed my opinion on the 31st July, 1860, in a Report on a case which occurred at Charleston, in South Carolina.

We stated in that Report, "that there is no rule or principle of international law which prohibits the Government of any country from requiring aliens, resident within its territories, to serve in the militia or police of the country, or to contribute to the support of such establishments."

Sir J. Dodson reported in the same general sense on May 9, 1836 (Belgium), and October 29, 1847 (Tuscany).

In England, the question "whether an alien would be compelled to serve in the militia" has never, as far as I am aware, been authoritatively decided.

The question of the liability of Her Majesty's subjects, in the present condition of the (heretofore) United States, is one of serious importance, and Lord Lyons' attention should be carefully directed to it. In those States wherein personal service may not be enforced against aliens, but in which they are only compellable to find a substitute or to pay a sum of money, there does not appear to me to be any urgent necessity for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government; but if personal service is or shall be actually enforced—more especially if the militia should be permanently embodied, and employed, not merely to maintain order and protect property, but in actual hostilities—the position of British subjects would appear to deserve very favourable consideration, and to call for every exertion being made in their favour on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

It may, perhaps, be advisable to instruct Lord Lyons to ascertain, and state precisely, what is the law and the practice on this head (especially as to compulsory personal service, without any alternative) in the different States; to explain whether any, and what, legal means of establishing or securing exemption are open to British subjects in any and which of the States; and also to ascertain what is the feeling of the principal European Powers, who, by reason of the number of their subjects in the United States, are likely to feel interested in this subject, such as France, Prussia, and Spain.

In the last resort, the existing secession of the Southern States may possibly give rise to a favourable occasion for settling the matter by express stipulation, either with them separately, or with the Federal Government at Washington. A militia ballot is not imminent, or likely to be ever general, in England; and the number of citizens of the United States resident in Her Majesty's dominions (excepting, possibly, in Canada) is so insignificant that any reciprocal stipulations might be, on the whole, advantageous to British interests in this matter.

Claim of Mr. Casaubon to exemption from conscription on the ground of having been born in the Mauritius, although of a French father.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 19, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th March instant, stating that with reference to the report of Her Majesty's Advocate-General of the 21st February ultimo,* he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying correspondence with Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, respecting an application which has been made to Earl Cowley by Mr. Casaubon, who states that he was born in the Mauritius, of a French father, and who has claimed the protection of the British Embassy as a British subject, in order to procure his exemption from having to draw for the conscription of the 1st instant, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, our opinion as to the instructions which should be given to Lord Cowley on the subject.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That there is no indication in these papers of the grounds upon which the French authorities consider Mr. Casaubon as being a Frenchman, and, as such, liable to the conscription.

Under these circumstances we recommend that Earl Cowley should request to be informed of the grounds upon which this gentleman has, notwithstanding his certificate of British nationality, and the fact of his having been born in the Queen's dominions, and resided there until he was of age, been subjected to the conscription.

In dealing with foreign Governments upon subjects of this nature, much inconvenience must arise if the principles of English law, as to natural-born British subjects, are attempted to be carried to their full extent.

---

* Page 28.

1861

In the present case, if the father of Mr. Casaubon had been an Englishman, and the Mauritius had been a French Colony at the time of Mr. Casaubon's birth, we should have claimed Mr. Casaubon as an English subject. A principle of reciprocity ought to prevail.

In the present case it is also observable that Mr. Casaubon appears, after he attained twenty-one, to have returned with his father to France, and to have been since resident and domiciled there. He has elected to take France as his country, and cannot be reasonably considered as personally entitled to British protection. Still as a certificate of British nationality has been given and disregarded, it seems fit that some inquiry should be made.

Jurisdiction over property of British subjects resident in Ottoman dominions, and dying leaving property.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 20, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch (No. 16) from the Judge of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, requesting to be furnished with instructions as to the jurisdiction of that Court, and other Consular Courts in the Ottoman dominions, over the property of British subjects resident within those dominions and dying, leaving property; and to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion as to the instructions which should be given to Mr. Hornby in regard to this matter.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it appears from Mr. Hornby's despatch that British subjects are not entitled, by Turkish law, to become owners (directly and openly) of land in Turkey. Consequently, Her Majesty has not obtained in Turkey, nor do her Courts possess, any jurisdiction to determine any question as to the ownership of land, or the descent or right of succession to it.

In other words, we have no jurisdiction over real property in Turkey, nor any authority to deal with the ownership of landed estates.

But a practice is stated to have prevailed, and to be recognized by Turkish law, by which a British subject wishing to possess land in Turkey has it conveyed to an Ottoman subject, and takes from the latter a mortgage of the land for a sum exceeding its value, under cover of which mortgage the British subject has the possession and enjoyment.

If so, it is plain that the only ownership of land which a British subject can have in Turkey, is of the nature of personal property; and that Her Majesty's Courts in Turkey have no jurisdiction to deal with it in any other character.

We are, therefore, of opinion that landed property in Turkey belonging to a British subject must, on his decease intestate, be regarded and treated by Her Majesty's Courts in Turkey as personalty, and administered as such, according to the rules which in such Courts regulate the succession to personal estate.

Claim of Messrs. Schemeil for losses incurred during disturbances in Syria.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 22, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th March instant, stating that, with reference to my report of the 9th March instant,* upon the claim of Messrs. Schemeil for compensation from the Ottoman Government on account of losses alleged to have been sustained by them in Syria, he was directed to transmit to me further letters from that firm on the same subject, and to request that I would take these letters, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to them.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That I see no reason to alter the opinion which I expressed on this case in my report of the 9th March instant.

As at present advised, therefore, I can only repeat that if Mr. Schemeil has sustained at the hands of the Turkish authorities any definite wrong or injury, or has any sufficient ground entitling him to the intervention of Her Majesty's Government, or of any British Consulate, he has altogether failed to make this apparent, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to enter into the question of the nationality of the firm.

If your Lordship desires my opinion upon any one or more definite questions, I must request to be favoured with those questions, inasmuch as I am unable to understand from Mr. Schemeil's letters, or from his printed speech at Liverpool "On the Trade and Financial Position of Turkey," the nature or amount of his claims, if any, against the Turkish Government for pecuniary compensation.

Detention at Caracas of the "Justina Blundell," an American vessel, for six days quarantine. Claim of Messrs. Hall and Co.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 22, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th of March instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 5th of June last, respecting the case of the "Justina Blundell," he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Nevett, complaining of the decision which has been come to in this matter, and in which Mr. Nevett now contests the legality of the detention of the "Justina Blundell;" and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, together with the previous correspondence, and report to your Lordship whether there is anything in Mr. Nevett's letter which modifies the opinion I have already expressed in this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I see nothing in Mr. Nevett's letter which so materially modifies the opinion which I have already expressed in this case, as to induce me to advise Her Majesty's Government to interfere.

I am not satisfied that the detention of the "Justina Blundell," a United States' merchant-vessel, for six days in quarantine, owing to an alleged defect in her bill of health, was absolutely illegal, or such as would have justified an international demand for compensation to Messrs. Hall and Co., British subjects, interested in her cargo.

However this may be, the detention occurred at Caraccas in June 1853; and a formal representation and demand was made by Mr. Bingham to the Venezuelan Government thereon on the 13th of January, 1854, which was negatively answered by that Government in July 1854.

Mr. Bingham did not reply to this answer, and nothing apparently passed between the two Governments on the subject since this date until July 1859, when Mr. Orme again addressed a communication to the Venezuelan Government, which was answered by Señor Rendon on the 24th of July, 1859.

Mr. Nevett's purchase (in 1856) of Messrs. Halls' claim, if it was then a claim capable of sale and purchase (which I cannot say that it was), is not a very favourable feature in the case, or calculated to induce Her Majesty's Government to re-open the case, after so long a silence.

On the whole, as the matter now stands, I cannot advise Her Majesty's Government to interfere any further.

Refusal of Governor of British Guiana to give up four French sailors, deserters from the war-steamer "Casabianca."

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 22, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th of March instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter and its inclosures from the Colonial Office, dated the 14th of March instant, respecting the circumstances under which the Governor of British Guiana had declined to give up four French sailors, who had deserted from the French war-steamer "Casabianca;" and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the letter from the Colonial Office.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration and have the honour to report—

That the course pursued by the Governor on the occasion in question appears to me have been perfectly correct.

I am not aware, and it does not appear from the papers, that any different course would have been followed by the French authorities in the event of the desertion in a French port of seamen from a British man-of-war.

Fine imposed at Calcutta on Captain of a French merchant-vessel for imprisoning a seaman guilty of a breach of discipline.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 23, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th February ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter from the India Office, dated the 11th of February ultimo, with its inclosures, relative to a case which has occurred in the Calcutta Police Court, in which the Captain of a French merchant-vessel in that port was fined by the Magistrate for imprisoning, on board, at the direction of the French Consul, a seaman who had been guilty of a breach of discipline; and to request that we would take these papers into consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer to be returned to Sir Charles Wood.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report,—

That we entirely concur with the opinion of the Advocate-General, Mr. Ritchie, upon this case.

In our opinion, the Police Magistrate at Calcutta had jurisdiction to hear and determine the complaint preferred before him by the seaman Capin against Captain Bécot, the Commander of the French merchant-vessel "Nautile," on board which Capin was serving; which vessel lay in a British port at the time of the cause of complaint arising. This is in accordance with the well-understood rule of the English law with reference to occurrences on board of foreign vessels being within British territorial jurisdiction. Such vessels are not (as M. Lombard suggests) "ex-territorial," but for all purposes of jurisdiction over acts committed on board, within the territory, territorial.

At the same time, it is of course, open to the person accused under such circumstances, to allege and prove a defence; and the captain of a foreign merchant-vessel would be entitled to an acquittal if he were to satisfy the Magistrate that in any restraint imposed on one of his crew, he had done no more than was reasonable in order to the preservation of discipline, or for the safety of the ship, and the like.

In this case, the only justification set up appears to have been the sanction of the French Consul; and this, for the reasons above set forth, was not only unavailing, but irrelevant to a defence.

AUSTRIA.

Expulsion from Verona of Giuseppe Fürst, an Ionian.,

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 23, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th March instant, stating that upon the receipt of my letter of the 26th November last, giving a report upon the case of Giuseppe Fürst, an Ionian subject who had been expelled from Verona by the Austrian authorities, your Lordship addressed the inclosed instruction to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires.

That Mr. Fane was directed to take measures for giving Mr. Fürst an opportunity of making his own observations upon his case; and that he was also directed to ascertain (confidentially) from Her Majesty's Consul-General at Venice, the real character and credibility to be attached to Fürst himself.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that he was directed by your Lordship to inclose the various despatches which have been received from Her Majesty's Representative at Vienna, together with the reports which have been received from Her Majesty's Consul-General at Venice, containing all the information which it has been possible to obtain upon the above subject; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, together with the former despatch, and report to your Lordship "what further steps should be taken in the matter."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, adverting to the testimonials to his general character and demeanour furnished by Mr. Fürst, which are numerously and respectably signed by inhabitants of Verona, and to the contents of Consul Perry's despatch of the 6th of March, 1861, I am of opinion that it may be safely assumed that there is nothing to affect Mr. Fürst's character or credibility, or to prevent Her Majesty's Government from taking up his case.

I have so fully entered into the case in my previous report of November 26, 1860, that I can only say the "further steps to be taken in the matter" are proper for your Lordship's consideration, as a matter of policy.

The case seems to me one of unjustifiable and flagrant wrong, deliberately inflicted by the Austrian police, without any reasonable cause, upon an Ionian under British protection, for which Her Majesty's Government is entitled to require both an apology and adequate pecuniary compensation.

The Austrian Government will, in all probability, refuse all reparation, inasmuch as they have done this successfully in at least three previous cases (mentioned in the Librarian's Memorandum). I would also add the case of Mr. Sichell (see Law Officers' Report of May 30, 1853). I am not aware of the result of this last case. It would almost appear that Her Majesty's Government has never, as yet, succeeded in obtaining any redress from Austria in any case of this class, and that the Austrian Government habitually expels, at its arbitrary pleasure, and with impunity, any British subject whom its police dislikes.

Under these circumstances the principal question for consideration would seem to me to be the course which Her Majesty's Government is prepared to pursue in the event of Austria refusing all reparation, as unless Her Majesty's Government is prepared to do something effectual, it may be a question (having regard to previous cases) what should be the tone and character of the demand (if any) in this case. This is obviously a matter beyond my province.

I can only say that the case appears to me of such a character as to make the insecurity of British subjects in the Austrian dominions apparent, and to give Her Majesty's Government perfectly good ground for enforcing reparation.

If it had occurred, for instance, in a South American Republic, prompt and ample reparation would have doubtless been enforced by Her Majesty's Government.

I observe that the British Consulate at Venice, which was instructed by Mr. Fane in December 1860, to report on this case, seems only to have reported on it on the 6th March, 1861, and then to have added no very material information to that of which Her Majesty's Government was previously in possession, and that I see no sufficient reason for this delay, which may be injurious to the case.

1861

Claim of the Daly family.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, March 27, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 19th March instant, stating that he was directed to state to me that on the receipt of my report of the 28th February, 1860,* respecting the claim of the representatives of the late Mr. Daly, your Lordship addressed to Mr. Orme, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Venezuela, a despatch, of which the draft was inclosed; that before this despatch could have reached Mr. Orme he had taken the steps in this matter which are reported in the despatch from him herewith inclosed.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that Mr. Orme has caused a report to be drawn up by his legal adviser, regarding the question which has arisen as to the sum in dispute between the Venezuelan Government and the heirs of Mr. Daly; and that the Venezuelan Minister of Finance has expressed his willingness to accept, as a definite arrangement, the estimate prepared by M. Caceres.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to request that I would take Mr. Orme's despatch into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether Mr. Orme should be instructed to sanction the proposed arrangement.

The previous correspondence connected with the case was inclosed for convenience of reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the end or upshot of the protracted attempts at evasion and delay in this case by the Venezuelan Government would seem to be that the only matter in difference between the two Governments (if such it can be called) is the terms of payment by Venezuela of what is admitted to have long been due, and by the retention of which the Daly family has been exposed to ruin. The Venezuelan Government now admits that this is a good debt; then why should it not be paid in cash? That Government, however, still seeks further delay.

I do not precisely understand the difference between the amount claimed and the sum now offered, but I can see no reason why Venezuela should not pay at once, and in cash, as I have already stated in my Report of the 28th of February, 1860. If, however, Her Majesty's Government is not prepared to exact this mode of payment for some reason unknown to me, and if the Daly family is satisfied with what is now proposed, I presume that the terms offered by Señor Delgado in his note of February 1, 1861, must be accepted, but I cannot, I own, see why this should be so.

Interest at 9 per cent. must at all events be exacted up to the day of payment of each instalment. I would beg to refer to my Report of January 14, 1861, on this claim.

EGYPT.

Appointment of a British Consular Chaplain at Suez.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 3, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 9th March ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to refer to us the Act of the 6th Geo. IV, cap. 87, "relative to British Consuls at foreign ports, and more particularly the 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of that Act, and also to refer to us the inclosed despatch from Her Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in Egypt (No. 7, February 14, 1861), forwarding an application, on behalf of the British residents at Suez, for the appointment at that port of a British chaplain under the Act.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to observe that the Consular officer at Suez merely held the rank of Vice-Consul; that his appointment was made by the sanction and under the authority of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and that provision was made for his salary from the moneys voted by Parliament for Consular Services; but that, according to the usual practice of the Foreign Office, the Vice-Consul was under the immediate superintendence of a superior Consular officer, who "in this instance is Her Majesty's Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, residing at Alexandria or at Cairo, and with whom, and not with the Secretary of State, the Vice-Consul corresponds:" and that the points upon which our opinion is desired are—

1st. Whether, under the Act of Parliament referred to, assistance can be given from the public funds towards the maintenance of a British chapel or chaplain at a port where the resident Consular officer only holds the rank of Vice-Consul; and this irrespective of the consideration that a superior Consular officer, with the rank either of Consul or Consul-General, is maintained in the country or district within which the Vice-Consulate is situated, and has superintendence and control over such Vice-Consul?

2ndly. Whether, if this cannot be done irrespective of the consideration stated, the fact that a superior Consular Officer with the rank of Consul or Consul-General is maintained in the country or district in which the Vice-Consul is situated, and has control and superintendence over the Vice-Consulate, though not residing at the port where the Vice-Consulate is locally established, will bring such Vice-Consulate within the scope of the Act in the matter in question, and warrant an appropriation of public money being made, if the Secretary of State thinks fit, in aid of the contributions of British residents at such port towards the maintenance of a chapel or chaplain?

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the questions submitted to us into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the answer to the questions in your Lordship's letter depends on the true construction of the 10th section of the 6th Geo. IV, cap. 87, inasmuch as the application of the British subjects at Suez is limited to the maintenance of a chaplain at that place.

There is nothing in the 10th section, which requires that the "Consul-General or Consul," who is to act by "advancing and paying any sum of money," &c., under it, should be resident at the port or place at which the chaplain is employed and maintained. Further, Suez is within the province and subject to the jurisdiction of the Consul-General of Egypt, inasmuch as the Vice-Consul at Suez is under the superintendence and subject to the control of such Consul-General. We are therefore of opinion that the Consul-General in Egypt fully answers the words "Consul-General" in the 10th section, and that the second question must be answered in the affirmative.

If the Vice-Consul at Suez were not subject to or included in the province of any Consul-General, we should incline to think that he would be a Consul within the meaning of the 10th section; for in such a case the term "Vice-Consul" would be a misnomer, and he would, in reality, fulfil the functions and stand in the rank of "Consul."

We should, in such a case, answer the first question also in the affirmative; but it is unnecessary to consider the hypothetical case put by the first question, when the real case, put in the second question, creates no difficulty.

We have, &c.

Validity of an affidavit taken before Her Majesty's Secretary of Embassy at Paris.

Doctors' Commons, April 4, 1861.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 20th March ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a despatch, and its inclosure, from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, in which a question is raised "whether a certain affidavit, taken before Her Majesty's Secretary of Embassy at Paris, under the Act 18 and 19 Vict., cap. 42, is valid;" the Registrar of Deeds at Dublin having returned the document so attested, on the ground that the Act in question authorizes Ambassadors and Secretaries of Legation to perform only such notarial acts as notaries public in the United Kingdom are empowered to do, and that the affidavit referred to was not of that class.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take the matter into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the instructions which should be addressed to Earl Cowley upon the question at issue.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have taken the papers submitted to us into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Act 18 and 19 Vict., cap. 42, has been misread in Ireland in a manner that is hardly credible.

The Irish Registrar's construction is: "The Act gives the Secretary of Embassy, &c., such powers only as are vested in a notary public; but a notary cannot take an affidavit of the perfection of a deed and memorial for the purpose of registry, therefore the Secretary of Embassy cannot do that which a notary could not do."

The first paragraph is wholly incorrect. By the first section, every Secretary of Embassy, &c., exercising his functions in any foreign country, is empowered to administer in such foreign country any oath, or take any affidavit or affirmation from any person whomsoever; and also to do and perform in such foreign country all and every notarial acts which a notary public could or might be required, and is by law empowered, to do within the United Kingdom.

If the section be read with common attention, it is plain to the reader that the power to do notarial acts is a distinct authority, superadded to the express authority to administer oaths and take affidavits or affirmations, which is the authority first given, and is of the most general and effective character.

The preamble shows clearly the intention of the Legislature, and the enacting part carries the intention most completely into effect.

There is no justification for the refusal of the Irish Registrar, or for his construction of the Act of Parliament, and the inconvenience that has resulted therefrom.

Mr. Rodocanachi's claim to special protection.

Doctors' Commons, April 8, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd April instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 18th March last,* he was directed to transmit to me a letter, dated April 2, 1861, from Messrs. Wilson, Dodgshon, and Papayanni, who have been appointed inspectors of the estate of Mr. Rodocanachi, stating the grounds on which protection is sought for that gentleman at Constantinople, and the nature of the protection required, and transmitting a certificate of Rodocanachi's naturalization as a British subject, and a copy of the power of attorney signed by him in their favour.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take the letter from Messrs. Wilson, Dodgshon, and Papayanni, together with the former papers, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which ought to be pursued in regard to this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it now appears that this application does not come from Mr. Rodocanachi himself (as stated by Mr. Reed in his letter of March 5), and that the "special protection" requested is wanted, not for him, but by his creditors, for their interest, and on behalf of his "affairs" (or "estate").

His certificate of naturalization (19th March, 1855) states that he is a "native of Scio," and contains an express exception of "any right and capacities of a natural-born British subject, out of or beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the limits thereof."

He is at Constantinople, and apparently in no danger of molestation.

No case has as yet arisen calling for or justifying any interference by Her Majesty's Government.

It remains to be seen upon what grounds (if any) the Austrian Legation in Turkey will interfere in the case; but there is no ground or reason for the application now made by the creditors for "special protection" to his "affairs," which it is out of your Lordship's power to grant.

Under these circumstances, I can only suggest that Messrs. Wilson, Dodgshon, and Papayanni may be informed that your Lordship cannot accede to their application.

Turkish blockade of coast of Albania.

Doctors' Commons, April 10, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a note, dated 6th April, which has been addressed to your Lordship by the Turkish Ambassador at Her Majesty's Court, announcing that from the $\frac{1\text{st}}{13\text{th}}$ of this month a blockade of the coasts of Albania, from Durazzo inclusive to the Austrian frontier, will be established by the Ottoman forces; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and, if the notification is sufficient, I would draw up and transmit to your Lordship a notice of the said blockade for publication in the "Gazette."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1st. That this note is obviously insufficient for the preparation of any "Gazette" notice, inasmuch as it only intimates an intention to establish the blockade in question as from the 13th instant, and does not state the fact of the actual establishment of any blockade.

2ndly. With a view to British commercial interests, the note of M. Musurus, may, however (if your Lordship thinks fit), be forthwith officially communicated to the Chairman of "Lloyd's," or made public in any manner short of formal and official publication in the "London Gazette."

3rdly. So many errors and inaccuracies constantly occur on the part of foreign Legations as to notifications of blockade, and their effect both upon private and international rights may be so serious, that I venture to suggest that your Lordship may possibly intimate (confidentially) to M. Musurus that a distinct announcement of the actual establishment of the blockade on and from a particular day, corroborated, if practicable, by an extract from or reference to a communication to this effect received from the Naval Commanding Officer on the spot, is the only "notification" which Her Majesty's Government can properly recognize by insertion in the "Gazette."

The Attorney-General to Lord Wodehouse.—(Received April 12.)

Dear Lord Wodehouse, Lincoln's Inn, April 12, 1861.

BELGIUM.

Civil-process in England against a Belgian vessel employed in the postal service.

THE words of the Treaty are so large that they must have been understood as containing an engagement that a vessel "freighted," that is, taken up, by the Belgian Government for the postal service should be free from every Civil process when in an English harbour.

But unless there is an Act of Parliament expressly authorizing this Government to enter into such a stipulation, it would have no effect on the rights of individuals. I cannot find any such Act of Parliament, and I shall be obliged to your Lordship to direct that immediate information be given to the Law Officers as to the Act of Parliament, if any, which it was supposed warranted the stipulation contained in this Treaty.

But, whether there be any such Act or not, it is clear that the Belgian Government has a right to assume that we had power to enter into the stipulation in question. And it is clear, therefore, that the English Government must take immediate steps for the release of the Belgian vessel, and must, with the consent of the Belgian Government, take upon itself the defence of that vessel to the action. I say with the consent of the Belgian Government, because it is clear that if in the result of that action it shall be proved that the Belgian vessel was in the wrong, the English Government will be entitled to a complete indemnity against the expenses it may have incurred for the Belgian; for it is by no means the intent or effect of the Treaty that the Belgian vessels should be indemnified against the consequences of any wrongful acts committed by them.

Pray send an early answer, and you shall have our joint opinion on Monday. I see the vessel was attacked on the 21st of last November; why has there been such delay by the Belgian Government?

Yours sincerely,

SPAIN.

Seizure and detention of the "Louisa." Full compensation should be demanded.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th March ultimo, stating that, with reference to our Report of the 23rd February last,* he was directed to transmit to us two despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid (Nos. 114 and 117), reporting that the Spanish Government have determined to restore the "Louisa" and her cargo to the owners, but without any indemnity for their losses.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to inclose three letters from the War Office, inclosing the reports of the Governor of Gibraltar on the same subject, and to request that we would take this case again into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in demanding an indemnity from the Spanish Government for the owners of the "Louisa."

The former papers were inclosed for convenience of reference.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 1st April instant, transmitting a further letter dated March 30, 1861, and its inclosures, from the War Office, respecting the decision arrived at by the Spanish Government with regard to the "Louisa."

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have read and considered the additional papers which have been transmitted to us, and have the honour to report—

That the case presents two aspects: one as respects the national outrage, it being now clear that a British merchant-ship was violently captured by a Spanish vessel of war in British waters; the other, as respects the injury done to the owners of the ship and cargo by such unwarrantable seizure and detention.

The Decree of the Spanish Court of Appeal admits that "it has not been sufficiently proved that the tartaro "Louisa," when seized, was within the maritime zone of Spain" (which zone, as appears from another part of the Decree, is unwarrantably claimed as extending to six miles from the shore); but the later evidence collected by Sir William Codrington proves incontestably that the "Louisa" was captured in British waters, as the commander of the "guarda costa" must have known at the time.

* Page 30.

The Decree then attempts to make out a case of probable cause for the seizure, by alleging "the irregularity observed in the Consular documents, the discrepancy observed in the number of bales found on board, and the alteration attempted to be made in the Consular register by one of the crew of the "Louisa;" but the answer is, not only that these allegations are denied by the testimony of the captain and crew of the "Louisa," but that the original prior act of the seizure and boarding of the "Louisa" by the "guarda costa" was an illegal outrage, and that nothing done or found on board the "Louisa," after this illegal act, can be appealed to as justifying or excusing it.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the circumstances fully justify Her Majesty's Government in claiming from the Spanish Government a full indemnity for every description of loss, damage, and expense sustained by the owners, in consequence of the seizure and detention of the "Louisa" and her cargo.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th of April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying papers, as noted in the margin,* respecting the arrest and imprisonment of Mr. Colbeck by the French authorities at Douai; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which should be pursued by Her Majesty's Government in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That assuming the entire correctness of the statements in the "Enquête"

(Inclosure No. 3 in Earl Cowley's No. 475), I do not see any sufficient ground for the interference of Her Majesty's Government in this case.

Mr. Colbeck's statement does not contain a complete narrative of all that passed between him and the authorities, and it is not attested or corroborated by any of his family or workmen.

Possibly your Lordship may consider it proper to transmit a translation of the "Enquête" to Mr. Colbeck, with an intimation that the circumstances therein stated must prevent your Lordship from interfering in his behalf. It will then be open to him to make any further communication to your Lordship which he may think expedient.

Unless Mr. Colbeck's treatment was either absolutely illegal, or at least more severe than that which any Frenchman would have received under precisely the same circumstances, your Lordship cannot interfere; he does not establish either position: and the French system of procedure, habits, and ideas on the subject of any resistance to or neglect of the regulations, or formal acts, of any constituted authorities, are so different from anything with which Englishmen are familiar, that I see no probability of his being able to make out any sufficient case for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government.

April 15, 1861.

My dear Lord Wodehouse,

EVERY man-of-war of a foreign country is protected from seizure or attachment in any form of civil process by international law. The term "man-of-war" would include every vessel of the regular navy of a foreign State, being the property of that State, and manned and commanded by a crew and officers in the naval service of that State (all this is explained in our Report): but this is not the case with the "Ruby;" she does not belong to the Belgian Government, is not borne on the books of the navy of that Government, and her officers and crew are not in the regular naval service of Belgium, at least so we understand; but in all these cases we constantly desiderate more accurate information as to facts.

The "Ruby" is, as recollected, freighted only by the Belgian Government; it was a very great oversight entering into a contract with Belgium to give civil immunity to such vessels, which we had no legal authority to do.

I drew a report on Saturday, and sent it to the Solicitor-General. You will no doubt have it to-day.

Proposed regulations for the government of foreign lightermen and boatmen in the port of Constantinople.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 12, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 27th March ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying correspondence as noted in the margin,* respecting the regulations proposed to be put in force by the Porte for the government of foreign lightermen and boatmen in the port of Constantinople, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and inform your Lordship whether, in my opinion, Her Majesty's Government would be justified in claiming, on behalf of British and Ionian subjects, exemption from the regulations in question.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose, for my information, the correspondence with Mr. Hornby, relative to the question raised by that officer in regard to his right of exercising jurisdiction over the masters and sailors of such small port craft as tugs and lighters, belonging to British subjects, and plying on the Bosphorus, in cases where the masters or sailors themselves are foreigners.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 2nd April instant, transmitting a further despatch from Her Majesty's Consul-General at Constantinople, respecting the proposed regulations for the government of foreign lightermen and boatmen at that port.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That in point of principle and of international law your Lordship's question must be answered in the negative.

Sir H. Bulwer in No. 116 to your Lordship, and in his despatch to Consul Cumberbatch of the 12th February, 1861 (Inclosure No. 4 in Sir H. Bulwer's No. 184), has taken the right view of this subject.

With respect to Consul Cumberbatch's observations and arguments, I must remark—

First, that there is nothing to show that other foreign Powers adopt this view.

Secondly, that Admiral Slade's "Memorandum" thereon (not dated or numbered, but inclosed in Sir H. Bulwer's No. 187), disposes of many of his observations.

Thirdly, the parties most directly interested do not appear to have addressed any remonstrances either to Sir H. Bulwer or to your Lordship.

With respect, however, to the compelling British or Ionian watermen and lightermen to become members of an "Esnaf" or Turkish Corporation, to the consequences to be apprehended therefrom, and to the alleged policy of Turkey in this respect, Mr. Cumberbatch's observations appear to me to be important, and not to have been effectually met or disposed of. There are obviously many peculiar considerations on this point applicable to Turkey.

This, however, is not a question of international law; but it does not seem to me to be essential to the registration and due control of the watermen and lightermen, nor altogether reasonable, that they should become members of a Turkish Corporation.

Mr. Hornby's correspondence on the subject of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople over steam-tugs and lighters the property of British subjects or Ionians, has been, I presume, finally disposed of by the Law Officers' Report of the 31st December, 1860. If this is not so, I must request a further and fuller communication thereon.

Mosquito land claims.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 16, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th April instant, stating that various subjects of Her Majesty assume to have claims to lands formerly, and now, in the occupation of the Mosquito Indians; that the nature of those claims is explained in a Report of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, dated 24th November, 1851, and in a Report presented to the Secretary of State in the year 1849, by two gentlemen who had been appointed to inquire into them, which papers were inclosed.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that under the Treaties with Honduras and Nicaragua those claims, instead of being, as formerly, to be preferred against the Mosquito Ruler alone, are now to be preferred severally, in certain proportions, against the Governments of the two Republics and the Mosquito Ruler; and the time having arrived for making arrangements for deciding upon these claims, your Lordship has caused to be prepared drafts of instructions to Mr. Green, Her Majesty's Consul at Greytown, with reference to the claims on Nicaragua and on the Mosquito King, and that your Lordship has already desired Her Majesty's Consul at Comayagua to make a communication to the Government of Honduras on the subject.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that your Lordship also considers that some notice of the intention to proceed to the examination of the claims should be inserted in the "London Gazette," and that drafts of such notice have been prepared accordingly.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that in transmitting to me these drafts, he was to request that I would take them into consideration, and report my opinion on the course which it is proposed to pursue, and on the manner in which it is proposed that public notice should be given of the intended course; and to add that if I could make my Report, at latest, by Tuesday morning the 16th April instant, your Lordship could transmit the instructions to Greytown by the mail of that evening.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That such of these papers as relate to the arrangement for the settlement of the claims in question with the Republics of Nicaragua and Honduras respectively present no peculiar difficulties; and as time presses, I have perused and settled the drafts noted in the margin,* and transmit them herewith, as requested.

The Commissioners, when actually appointed, should duly advertise beforehand the day and place of their sittings, and in case of any considerable adjournment, the particulars of such adjournment, sending home copies for insertion in the Gazette.

It will also probably be advisable for the Commissioners, at their first meeting, or as early as practicable thereafter, to give public notice by advertisement of their being duly constituted, and prepared to adjudicate upon claims; and also to fix and advertise a date after which they will not receive any claims; sending home a copy of the advertisements for insertion in the "London Gazette," if necessary.

The Gazette notices transmitted herewith should, of course, be duly advertised in the newspapers circulating in Honduras and Nicaragua, and especially at Greytown.

I presume that it is intended to send to the Representative of Her Majesty's Government at (Comayagua) Honduras, a note or instruction similar to that now prepared for Mr. Green at Greytown, in his character of Representative of Her Majesty's Government to that of Nicaragua.

In the event of the same person having claims against both Nicaragua and Honduras, care should be taken by the Commissioners to manage their sittings, as to such claims, as to secure to the claimant proper opportunities for supporting his claim at each place.

The papers relating to the claims on the so-called Mosquito reserve or territory (proper), present some peculiar difficulties, and I have therefore, by arrangement with Mr. Hammond, reserved them for a further and separate Report.

I have, &c.

Syers, Braasch and Co., a commercial firm at La Guayra, that the Venezuelan Government have shown an unfair partiality towards another firm in La Guayra, Messrs. and to request that I would take the inclosed papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in giving any support to Messrs. Syers' complaint against the Venezuelan Government on the ground of undue preference having been shown to Messrs. Seixas.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it is much to be regretted that in a case turning entirely upon the terms and construction of a Venezuelan Decree, Mr. Orme should have omitted to forward any copy or translation of the Decree in question. I beg to invite attention to this singular omission as a strong illustration of the necessity for the issuing of the Consular circular alluded to in my note of the 8th April instant.

As the matter actually stands, I am unable to say that there is any sufficient cause for any further interference by Her Majesty's Government; but a copy and translation of the Decree should be transmitted, and the papers may be again submitted to me therewith.

Turkish blockade of coast of Albania.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 17, 1861.

WITH reference to a verbal communication which I had with Mr. Hammond and Lord Wodehouse at the Foreign Office on the 15th April instant, I beg to state that I had a personal interview yesterday, the 16th instant, with his Excellency the Turkish Ambassador (by his desire) on the subject of the notification of the blockade of the Adriatic coast of Albania (see my Report of the 10th April instant*), when his Excellency expressed his intention of making a communication to his Government requesting further particulars on the subject.

Refusal of Turkish Minister of Finance to exchange for good money caimés deposited in British Consulate by M. Valsamachy.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 17, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 19th March ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a despatch, together with its inclosure, which had been received from the Judge of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, requesting instructions with reference to a refusal of the Turkish Minister of Finance to exchange for good and current money old caimés for 2,000 piastres which had been deposited under seal in the iron safe of the British Consulate, by a defendant in a suit in the said Supreme Consular Court, during whose absence in England all caimés of the nature deposited were called in by the Ottoman Government, and to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which should be returned to Mr. Hornby's application.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the first question is, whether the deposit made by Valsamachy of the 2,000 piastres in the hands of Mr. Ward, remained so deposited at the sole risk of Valsamachy, or at the joint risk of the two contending parties? The Supreme Court at Constantinople appears to have decided that the deposit remained at the sole risk of Valsamachy, and probably the decision was right.

The question then remains whether Valsamachy has any ground of complaint against the English Government by reason of any neglect on the part of its Consul, Mr. Ward, or any such just cause of complaint against the Turkish Government as to entitle him to the interference of the English Government on his behalf?

We are of opinion that he has no cause of complaint in either case.

---

* Page 61.

1. Whether Mr. Ward ever knew, or knowing forgot, the contents of the deposit, is, on Mr. Hornby's statement, ambiguous. One passage states he never knew, another admits that he did. It is immaterial, if it be correct (as is stated in another sentence) that Mr. Ward could not properly open the deposit parcel without the consent of the depositor. It was the duty of Valsamachy, who knew what he had deposited, to provide for the exchange, and the loss has resulted from his own neglect.

2. As to the conduct of the Turkish Government, we understand the caimé to be a metallic coinage, and that the old caimé is still worth the intrinsic value of the metal, though not equal to the current value. These coins appear to have been called in by the Turkish Government, and a peremptory time fixed by public notice, after which the old coins would not be received. This is the proper and usual course, and there is no ground for any interference by the British Government.

If, however, the caimés are paper-money, and now of no value whatever, we must desire further and fuller information; and especially as to whether Mr. Valsamachy, as depositor, now advances a claim against the Turkish Government, and if so, on what particular grounds. A translation of the Government note (the caimé) should be laid before us.

Forfeiture of British protection in Turkey by British subjects returning without permission after being deported by Consular Court.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th of February ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us despatches from Mr. Hornby (Nos. 9 and 11 of February 6 and 8), and which appeared to your Lordship to make it desirable to reconsider the provision of the last clause of section 50 of the Order in Council of the 27th of August ultimo, in regard to the forfeiture of British protection in the Ottoman dominions by British subjects returning without permission to those dominions after being deported from thence by sentence of a Consular Court.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that this clause was taken from a similar provision in the previous Order in Council of the 19th of June, 1844; and also that it appeared from the inclosed despatches, and also from the previous despatch from Mr. Hornby, No. 34 of the 9th of November, 1859, that Mr. Hornby leans to the opinion that, considering the defective state of criminal jurisprudence in Turkey, the abandonment of British subjects returning without permission from deportation subjects them to a degree of hardship almost intolerable, and that, consequently, it would be desirable to modify the clause of the Order in Council so as to make the return from deportation a substantive offence cognizable by the British Consular Court, and punishable as any other offence.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that if such a course could in our opinion be adopted, your Lordship would be glad if we would suggest the means of proceeding; but that, whether it can be adopted or not, there will remain for consideration a still wider question, namely, the extent to which Her Majesty's Government, through Her Majesty's Diplomatic or Consular servants in the East, can interfere to mitigate the hardships inflicted on prisoners in Turkish custody, either previously to or subsequently to their conviction for offences against Turkish Law, and triable by a Mixed Tribunal under Article 42 of the Capitulations.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that it appeared from Mr. Hornby's statements, both in his recent despatch, and in his other Reports in the accompanying volume, that there is great reason to complain of the dilatory manner in which the Judicial authorities of the Porte deal with such cases, and also of the severity in excess of the sentences passed by the Turkish Courts, in consequence of defective arrangements of the Porte for carrying such sentences into execution; and that it seems, therefore, to be deserving of consideration how far Her Majesty's Government can justly interfere with the ordinary course of the Turkish administration to secure for prisoners amenable to Turkish Tribunals a speedy hearing, and to prevent the sentences passed upon them from being aggravated by the mode of carrying them out.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that your Lordship apprehends that any measures which may be required for this purpose, or any representations which may be addressed to the Porte, would fall not within the province of the Consular Officer, but within that of Her Majesty's Ambassador as the supreme protector of British subjects in the Ottoman dominions; and also, that even in the case of returned convicts, it may be supposed that the forfeiture of British protection extends no further than such protection as British subjects are entitled to as regards being subject either to the exclusive or co-ordinate jurisdiction of a British officer, which jurisdiction is peculiar to Turkey and countries similarly situated, but that it does not extend to deprive a British subject of that ordinary protection which would be extended to him under all circumstances in countries where no such peculiar jurisdiction exists.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to state that your Lordship also apprehended that, as a general rule, the British Representative in a foreign country would be entitled to remonstrate in behalf of British prisoners in positions such as are described in the accompanying papers, where unreasonable delay is shown in bringing them to trial, where the trial is manifestly conducted irregularly, and where the sentence is rendered more severe than by its terms it should be, in consequence of the defective arrangements made for carrying it out.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state, if we concurred in these views, your Lordship would be prepared to instruct Her Majesty's Ambassador in conformity with them; and also that although the Consular authority may be the proper person to ascertain the facts, yet it would seem to be rather within the province of the Ambassador to represent those facts to the Turkish Government, and to call upon the Porte to deal with British prisoners in Turkish custody with justice and humanity.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That by section 50 of the Order in Council of August 1860, deportation is not imposed as a punishment for crime, but rather as a preventive measure, where the individual deported is unable to find that security for future good conduct which his actions have entitled the Judge to require. No doubt a return after such deportation may be treated as an offence, and punished with imprisonment, under an Order in Council properly framed for this purpose.

And if the British Court at Constantinople has a prison attached to it in which such delinquents may be incarcerated, it would be on every account better to substitute an order to this effect for the latter part of section 50.

But if this is not the case, and deported persons on returning and being sentenced to imprisonment must suffer such imprisonment in a Turkish prison, such punishment would be too severe, it being in a great majority of cases equivalent to sentence of death.

It seems to be an idle thing to assume the administration of our own criminal law in Turkey, unless the Criminal Courts are provided with proper means of incarcerating offenders both before and after trial, and also of carrying sentences of penal servitude into execution. It is true that great part of the criminals tried and sentenced by British jurisdiction in Turkey are either Maltese or Ionians, and that great part of the evil complained of would be removed by sending Maltese criminals to undergo their sentences in Malta, and Ionians in like manner to Corfu.

With respect to the more general questions proposed in Mr. Hammond's letter, we are of opinion that, where the subjects of one country go to reside in another, and become subject to its municipal law, either civil or criminal, it is not competent to the native Government of such subjects to make any complaint of that municipal law, or to require its alteration, but that if any of such subjects are committed to prison in such foreign country under the charge of having broken its criminal law, and there is unreasonable delay in bringing the accused to trial, that delay forms a subject of just complaint by the country of the accused; or if a prisoner, before or after trial, is kept imprisoned in a manner not consistent with humanity, or which, in the case of the condemned criminal, greatly aggravates the sentence, we think the native Government of the accused or convicted person has a clear right to interfere, even though the native subjects of such foreign country are, when in prison, subjected to similar treatment. No country has a right to violate the laws of humanity with regard to the subjects of another country, even if it violates them with regard to its own.

We therefore concur with the views of your Lordship, as stated in Mr. Hammond's letter, except that one of the suggested grounds of interference, viz., "where the trial is manifestly conducted irregularly," is too loose and indefinite. Where a trial is conducted in a manner at variance with the universally acknowledged principles of criminal justice, there might be a just ground of interference.

It is, we think, quite clear that it is within the province of the Ambassador, and not of the Consul or Judge, to represent your Lordship's views to the Turkish Government.

Claim of Portuguese Consul to take charge of effects of Portuguese subjects dying intestate in British Guiana.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th April instant, stating that, with reference to our Report of the 11th February last,* he was directed to transmit to us a letter, dated March 20, which your Lordship caused to be addressed to the Colonial Office, together with the reply, dated March 31, received from that Department, respecting the administration of intestate estates in British Guiana, and to state to us that, before your Lordship pronounces any opinion on the proposed instructions to Governor Wodehouse, your Lordship would be glad to receive any further observations which we may have to offer on the subject.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we have read the despatch proposed to be sent by the Colonial Office to Governor Wodehouse, of which we entirely approve as very clearly and correctly expressing the opinions and recommendations contained in our former Report. No other observations have occurred to us.

Mr. Fortescue to Mr. Hammond.

Downing Street, March 31, 1861.

Sir,

I AM directed by the Duke of Newcastle to acknowledge your letter of the 20th instant, respecting the claims of the Portuguese Consuls to deal with the estates of Portuguese subjects dying intestate in British Guiana.

It appears from that letter that the proper disposal of the property of these persons, in the absence of heirs, depends upon their domicile—such property belonging to the British Crown if the Portuguese has acquired a domicile in British Guiana, but probably to the Portuguese Crown if he has not acquired such a domicile.

This distinction renders it impossible that the instructions sent out to British Guiana should be couched in the terms of my letter of the 12th November, in which Lord John Russell has expressed his concurrence.

The Duke of Newcastle, therefore, thinks it best to request Lord John Russell to peruse the inclosed draft of a despatch which his Grace proposes to address to the Governor of British Guiana, and to inform him whether the course there prescribed is in accordance with his Lordship's views.

I am, &c.

Inclosure 2 in No. 77.

Proposed Despatch to Governor Wodehouse.

Downing Street, , 1861.

Sir,

THE right of the Portuguese Consuls to take charge of the personal property of Portuguese subjects dying in British Guiana, which has formed the subject of several despatches addressed by you to this Department, has been brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government by the Portuguese Minister in this country; and, after communication with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, I have to give you the following instructions upon the subject:—

The question arises upon Article II of the Treaty of the 3rd July, 1842, which provides that the subjects of either of the Contracting Parties may dispose, by will, of their effects in the territories of the other, and that their heirs may succeed to those effects, "and may obtain possession of the same, in due course of law, either in person or by other persons appointed by them to act in their behalf."

"In the event of the absence of heirs," the Article proceeds, "or of persons duly appointed to act for them, the Consul may be authorized to take charge, in due course of law, of the said effects until the owner shall have made the necessary arrangements for obtaining possession of the property."

Disputes between different claimants are to be "decided by the Courts of the country in which the property is situated."

On the other hand, a Local Ordinance (No. 7 of 1851) provides that the Administrator-General shall take possession of the effects of any person dying intestate in British Guiana when the heir is unknown or absent from the Colony without an attorney or agent in the Colony to represent him (section 2, paragraphs 3 and 4), subject to a provision that the Administrator-General shall not give up possession of an estate which he considers insolvent, unless the person claiming it will give security for payment of the intestate's debts.

In virtue of Article II of the Treaty above quoted, the Portuguese Consul, acting under instructions from his Government, appears to have asked for a return of the Portuguese subjects dying in British Guiana, in order that the balances of their estates might be handed over to the proper authority in Lisbon. It appears that hitherto no such return has been furnished, and it is to be assumed that the unclaimed effects of deceased Portuguese, after satisfying the creditors, are paid over by the Administrator-General to the Receiver-General of British Guiana (Ordinance, Section 83), and after a lapse of ten years (Section 86) become the property of the Colony.

I do not consider that this mode of proceeding (if I have rightly apprehended it) is capable of satisfactory defence, since the effect must be to leave in the British Guiana Treasury the proceeds of property, the ownership of which might be ascertained if proper means were taken to discover it. Among the most obvious of such means (independently of any Treaty) is the communication to the Portuguese Consul of every information which would enable him to discover the heirs of his deceased countrymen. It is clear, then, that such information ought to be regularly and correctly given.

But, besides receiving such information, the Consul may, as I understand the Treaty, be authorized by his Government "to take charge, in due course of law, of the effects of the deceased person in the absence of the heirs, or of any person duly appointed to represent them." This clause does not appear to be intended to secure to the Portuguese Consuls the right of administering the estates of deceased Portuguese, but only of receiving for transmission to Portugal, or elsewhere, any balances of such estates which "in due course of law," and subject, therefore, to the rights of creditors and co-heirs, would be ultimately receivable by representatives of the deceased not resident in British Guiana. But this right presupposes the existence of such representatives. If no such representatives can be found, I am advised that the proper disposal of the property of the deceased person depends on his domicile. If he is domiciled in British Guiana his property (in the absence of creditors, heirs, and legatees) belongs to the British Crown, and may be disposed of according to the law of British Guiana. If, on the contrary, though resident in British Guiana, he retains his Portuguese domicile, his property (in the absence of creditors, heirs, and legatees) will be disposed of as provided by the law of Portugal in such cases. It may be assumed it would belong to the Portuguese Crown.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me the effects of a Portuguese dying intestate, and without heirs in the Colony, should, on grounds of general convenience, and may, consistently with the terms of the Treaty, be taken possession of in the first instance by the Administrator-General, as provided by law in the case of other persons so dying, that the claims of creditors upon the estate should, "in due course of law," be satisfied by him, and that proper steps should be taken by advertisement, by lapse of time, or other recognized methods, to give the heirs, if resident in British Guiana, the opportunity to come forward; and at the same time the Portuguese Consul ought to receive a notification of the death and intestacy, with the information most calculated to enable him to discover the parties entitled to the net assets, if not resident in British Guiana.

If an heir appears, and proves his claim, the property will of course be handed over to him, or to any "person duly appointed by him," or to the Consul, being authorized to claim, on behalf of the heir, by some special or general instruction of his own Government.

If no specific claim is established on the part of any heir, the residue (after satisfying the creditors) may be handed on to the Portuguese Consul, under the following circumstances:—

1. If the Portuguese subject retain his Portuguese domicile, in which case it is clear that the property must belong either to the Portuguese Crown, or to some representative of the deceased not resident in British Guiana.

2. If it be sufficiently shown that heirs exist elsewhere than in British Guiana, of whose interests (though their rights inter se remain a matter of dispute or inquiry) the Portuguese Consul is the legitimate guardian.

But if the deceased Portuguese is domiciled in British Guiana, and if the Portuguese Consul is unable to establish the fact that he has left heirs behind him, then the property will be retained by the Administrator-General, and be subject to the law of British Guiana like the property of a British subject dying under similar circumstances.

You will ascertain from the Attorney-General whether any alteration is necessary in the law of the Colony, in order to enable you to give effect to these instructions, and if this should be the case, will proceed, with his assistance, to frame such Legislative measures as may be required.

Turkish blockade of coast of Albania.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 20, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 18th April instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 10th April instant,* respecting the insufficiency of the information contained in M. Musurus' note of the 6th April, to enable me to draw up a notification of the blockade of the coast of Albania, he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying note from M. Musurus, containing further information on that subject, and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and if the information is sufficient, that I would draw up and transmit to your Lordship a notice of the said blockade, for publication in the "Gazette."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have prepared and herewith transmit, a form of Notification for insertion in the "Gazette."

I assume, of course, that Her Majesty's Government is satisfied that such a state of armed insurrection or revolt against the Turkish Government exists in and throughout the coasts now blockaded, as to render the imposition of this blockade by the Turkish Government justifiable by the Law of Nations.

It will be the duty of the Turkish Government to provide forthwith a properly-constituted Prize Court at some convenient port, to hear and determine, according to the Law of Nations, all cases of capture for the breach of this blockade.

Possibly it may be advisable to call the attention of the Turkish Government to this point, and to request information thereon.

Civil process in England against a Belgian vessel employed in the postal service.*

* See also pages 62 and 64.

Sir, Doctors' Commons, April 20, 1861.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, transmitting to me copy of a note from the Belgian Minister, calling attention to the circumstances under which an Admiralty warrant had (as supposed) been issued for the arrest of the Belgian packet-boat "Rubis," pending the result of some legal proceedings taken against that vessel by the owners of the British vessel "Antagonist," stated to have been run down by the "Rubis."

You also inclosed a copy of a report which Her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General had drawn up on this case, and stated you were directed by Lord John Russell to request that I would take immediate steps to obtain the release of the "Rubis" forthwith from the action of the Admiralty warrant.

In reply I beg to state, from inquiries I have made, it appears that an action has been entered in the High Court of Admiralty against the owners of the "Rubis" in the sum of 1,200*l.* in a cause of damage for having run down the British vessel "Antagonist," but the warrant has not been executed, and consequently the "Rubis" has not been detained.

I am informed by Messrs. Clarkson, the Proctors engaged for the "Antagonist," that instead of stopping the "Rubis" by executing the warrant, they thought it proper, as a matter of courtesy, to communicate with Mr. Latham, the Belgian Consul at Dover, and put him in possession of the facts of the case.

Mr. Latham in his reply states that the "Rubis" is a Belgian Government mail-packet running between Ostend and Dover, and that he had forwarded their communication to the Belgian Government, and that they should hear from him again on the subject, which they have not yet done.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to try the case, unless with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, acting on behalf of and with the consent of the Belgian Government, who, in the event of proceedings being taken, should indemnify Her Majesty's Government for the expenses incurred in trying the question.

If a good defence can be given to the action, the opinion of the High Court of Admiralty may easily be obtained in a short space of time and at a moderate expense; but I take the liberty of suggesting that as the owners of the "Antagonist" are only poor fishermen, and have nothing to depend on but their boat for the support of their wives and families, whether it would not be an act of grace on the part of the Belgian Government to pay their demand (about 800*l.*) without any legal proceedings.

Disposal of slaves and crew of a slave-vessel wrecked on one of the Bahama cays.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 14th March ultimo, stating that, with reference to our report of the 5th March ultimo,* upon certain questions arising out of the recent wreck of two slave vessels within British jurisdiction in the Bahama Islands, he was directed to transmit to us, together with the former papers, two further letters and their inclosures from the Colonial Office, reporting the proceedings of the Colonial authorities in regard to the disposal of the slaves and crew of the slave-vessel which was wrecked on one of the Bahama cays in the month of July last, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether there is anything contained in them which would induce us, in any way, to alter the opinion expressed in our Report of the 5th March ultimo, or which calls for any special observations.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion whether, with reference to the case of the slaves who were wrecked in December last on one of the Bahama cays, and subsequently transhipped to Cuba, Her Majesty's Government would be justified in requiring them to be liberated by the Spanish authorities.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th March ultimo, transmitting a letter from the Colonial Office, inclosing copies of further despatches from the Governor of the Bahama Islands, containing information respecting proceedings connected with the wreck of the slave-vessel which took place on Cay Labos, one of the Bahama Cays, in the month of December last.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we find nothing in these papers to induce us to alter the opinion expressed by us in our Report of the 5th March ultimo.

Her Majesty's Government has acted in the whole matter under the advice of Mr. Rothery.

The prosecution against the crew of the wrecked slaver was abandoned, and the prisoners were discharged by the Governor under the advice of the Colonial Attorney-General, and probably in consequence of the communication to him of the opinion of Mr. Rothery, that a criminal offence had not been committed.

In the event of their being evidence of the crew of a slaver, afterwards found within British jurisdiction, having violated English law whilst voluntarily within British jurisdiction (as by navigating a slaver in British waters, or by detaining persons in slavery on British territory, on land, whether inhabited or not), it will be for the local authorities, under the advice of their Law Officers, to proceed cautiously to institute criminal proceedings against them, as pointed out in our Report of the 5th March.

The case of landing and transhipping slaves in British territory is obviously cognizable by British law. Even if after being wrecked on British territory the master and crew detained the slaves as slaves, we are of opinion that, upon sufficient proof, a conviction would not be a breach of international law. The nature of the proof, and the circumstances of the case, must be considered by the local Law Officers.

* See Page 41.

The whole case points clearly to the urgent necessity for the immediate employment of an adequate British naval force in the waters of the Bahamas, and to the propriety of promptly and handsomely rewarding Pinder and the other British subjects concerned, for their conduct on this occasion. They will not, however, be entitled to bounty, as for capture at sea, or to a similar scale of reward.

The last question in Lord Wodehouse's letter must, in our opinion, be answered strictly in the negative. Her Majesty's Government has not, by the Treaty of June 28, 1835, or by international law, any strict right to require the liberation of the slaves in question.

A representation of the circumstances of the case may be made to the Spanish Government, and the punishment of the crew for violating the Spanish law by landing slaves in Cuba should be demanded, and the liberation of the slaves requested.

With reference to the additional papers transmitted with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th March ultimo, we approve of the course adopted by the Attorney-General at Nassau, of having the materials of the wreck of the slaver "Atlantic" arrested as derelict property, with the view of subjecting the conduct of the wreckers, should they think fit to appear as claimants, to a judicial investigation.

Apart from this, we agree with the Attorney-General at Nassau that the existing evidence would not authorize any proceedings, criminally or otherwise, against either the wreckers or the light-house keepers, however strong our moral conviction may be of their complicity in the crimes of the captain and crew of the slaver.

If any sufficient evidence can, however, be procured, offering a reasonable probability of convicting any of the parties implicated in committing a felony (by landing and transhipping slaves) within British territorial limits, they should be arrested and prosecuted at Nassau: it will be for them to prove that they acted under "duress," and, if found guilty, the circumstances may be considered in mitigation of punishment.

We entirely concur with Governor Bayly's despatch (January 12, 1861; Inclosure No. 3 in Colonial Office letter of March 20, 1861), as to the necessity of giving prompt and liberal rewards to those British subjects who well deserve them by acting rightly under circumstances of strong temptation.

All the facts and particulars connected with the case of the United States' slaver "Atlantic" (managing owners, Abranches, Almeida, and Co., New York, 699 tons, pretending to be a whaler) should be communicated to the Government of the United States and to that of Spain, and the arrest and condign punishment of the guilty parties demanded.

Claim of Mr. Nevett for forcible seizure of his property by a party of insurgents.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th April instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 22nd March,* in conjunction with Her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General, as to the responsibility of the Venezuelan Government for damage done to the property of foreigners by insurgents, he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Nevett, dated March 22, 1861, requesting that Her Majesty's Government will support his claim on the Venezuelan Government for the forcible seizure of his property by a party of insurgents; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether there is any ground for the interference of Her Majesty's Government in this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1861

That I know not to what Report of the Law Officers reference is intended to be made, unless it be to that of February 25, 1861, on losses sustained by British subjects in Venezuela by the acts of insurgents against the Government there. I am not aware of any Report dated the 22nd March, 1861.*

The Law Officers, in the above Report, stated (in accordance with my previous Report of September 8, 1860) that "the Venezuelan Government could not be held responsible, generally, for injuries inflicted on the property or persons of foreigners resident in the country by insurgents engaged in open and armed hostility to the Government, and which injuries the Government had not the power to prevent."

The effect of this opinion appears to me to be decidedly adverse to Mr. Nevett's claim to the interference of Her Majesty's Government in his favour in this particular case; but I am not sure that I understand his letter, which may be referred to Mr. Orme for determination, in accordance with the principle stated in the above Reports.

Claims for losses sustained during the war between France and Morocco in 1844.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 22, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister in Morocco (No. 23), reporting that the French Government have obtained from the Moorish Government compensation for the losses which certain French subjects are declared to have sustained during the hostilities between France and Morocco in the year 1844; that Mr. Hay states that other foreign countries intend to advance the claims of their subjects on account of property pillaged by the wild tribes of Morocco in 1844, and he requests instructions for his guidance in the event of any similar claims being put forward by British subjects.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose, for my information, the correspondence which took place in the year 1844 with reference to the claims made at that time by certain British subjects on account of losses then sustained; and to request that I would take this question into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which Her Majesty's Government should take in regard to it.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this question into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the matter is not at present in such a shape as to enable me to advise your Lordship on the course which Her Majesty's Government should pursue.

I observe that my predecessor reported his opinion on this subject on the 17th of September and the 6th of November, 1844; and that the Earl of Aberdeen, then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, adopted the opinion expressed by Sir John Dodson, and on the 16th November, 1844, officially instructed Mr. Drummond Hay "that Her Majesty's Government could not advance any claim against the Government of Morocco;" and that especially as regarded Mr. Willshire's losses at Mogadore, "it could not be questioned that the persons by whom the plunder was effected were quite beyond the control of the authorities of the Emperor of Morocco." I presume that the claimants acquiesced, or have, in fact, been silent ever since; and I am not aware of anything material having taken place from that time to the present.

Mr. Hay in his despatch No. 23 (11th March last) gives no new information bearing on the question, or tending to alter this decision of Her Majesty's Government, announced recenti facto, and adhered to for upwards of sixteen years.

The circumstance stated by him, that the French Government (which was at war with Morocco in 1844) has recently received a considerable sum on account of losses then suffered by French subjects is by no means conclusive; non constat how these losses were sustained, or on what terms, or by what international agreement they have now been compensated: at all events, this was a matter arising inter belligerentes, and does not directly bear upon neutral claims. It does not appear that any other Government has as yet sustained, or even formally made, any claim in respect of these losses.

Mr. Hay merely adds, that some of the other Foreign Agents at Tangier intend also to put forward the claims of their subjects whose property was pillaged by the wild tribes during the war of 1844; he does not say whether any such claims were originally advanced in or soon after 1844, and with what result; nor does he give any further particulars, or any intimation as to the course which the Government of Morocco is likely to take, nor suggest any special reason for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government.

It is obvious, therefore, that this is one of that class of cases in which instructions are requested without any adequate materials for such instructions being supplied.

It remains to be seen whether what may hereafter ensue will induce Her Majesty's Government to take any and what steps in a matter on which it has already expressed a strong opinion, and on which all the British claimants are apparently silent: but I cannot at present, and as the case actually stands, see the slightest reason for any interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

I have, &c.

Sale, by British subjects, of estates at Surinam with slaves attached.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 25, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th April instant, stating that with reference to his letter of the 27th February last, inclosing a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Surinam, reporting the contemplated sale by British subjects in that island of three estates with slaves attached, he was directed to transmit to us a further despatch from Mr. Munro (No. 4, March 19, 1861), reporting the transfer of Mr. Macdonald Parry's half-share of Plantations Alkmaar and Fredericksdorp, with all the slaves attached, to Mr. Barnett Lyon.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Consul merely transmits a copy of a newspaper, containing an advertisement of the transfer of a certain share of a plantation in Surinam, "with all attached."

There is no Report or statement of facts tending to show that, as a matter of fact, any British subject has violated the English law.

We can only refer to our Report of the 7th November, 1860, and point out the necessity of a more explicit communication from the Consul.

Complaint of Mrs. Parry against Mr. Hornby in re Crawford v. Parry.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 25, 1861.

WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th instant, containing observations on the Report we had the honour of making to your Lordship on the 7th ultimo,* on the complaint made by Mrs. Parry against Mr. Hornby, the Chief Judge at Constantinople, and the letter of explanation addressed by Mr. Hornby to your Lordship.

In the observations which we felt it our duty to make on Mr. Hornby's conduct, and the language of his letter, we were by no means forgetful of the 13th section of the Order in Council, 1857 (now revoked), or of the correspondent sections in the Order of August 27, 1861.

We prepared those Orders, and are well aware of their spirit and effect.

They were intended to empower and exhort the Judge to be zealous in discharging one of the highest judicial duties, namely, to promote reconciliation and mutual agreement between parties litigant in his Court.

But we entirely dissent from the conclusion that, having regard to these orders, the Chief Judge at Constantinople may with propriety act as the private adviser of parties in business transactions.

Suppose two persons in England engage in a treaty (as in the present case), the one to buy and the other to sell an estate; would they think of resorting to one of the Judges of Westminster Hall to settle their contract? and if a Judge entertained such an application, performing duties usually discharged by Counsel and Solicitors, and a legal dispute afterwards arose between the parties, would he feel himself qualified to sit as a Judge to decide the cause?

The Judges of Westminster Hall constantly abstain from taking any part in the decision of matters in which they have acted as Counsel.

For the mind of a Judge should be entirely free from any antecedent impression, and influenced solely by the evidence in the cause; but this cannot be the case where the Judge has had previous communications with the parties.

This cause of Crawford v. Parry has been heard and decided by Mr. Legal Vice-Consul Wroth, sitting for Mr. Hornby; but any further proceeding in the cause would come before Mr. Hornby. Can any man read Mr. Hornby's letter to your Lordship, and say that he could, with propriety, sit as a Judge between these parties?

We must, therefore, in the strongest manner, but with great respect to your Lordship, express our dissent from any interpretation of the Orders in Council, or any opinion, that would extend to the Chief Judge of the Supreme Court at Constantinople a latitude of action which would be disapproved of in a Judge at home.

We beg to refer to section 5 of the Order in Council of August 27, 1860.

We desire that the rules of conduct deemed essential for the purity of the administration of justice in England should be required to be observed abroad; and from our official experience (now, in the case of two of us, extending over several years) we are daily more and more convinced that the administration of justice in the East requires the most severe and vigilant superintendence. We wrote our former Report under the influence of these general considerations, but as we can have no feeling but that of entire goodwill to Mr. Hornby, we most gladly adopt your Lordship's suggestion as to the omission of the latter part of that Report.

We therefore beg leave, in accordance with the suggestion contained in Mr. Hammond's letter of March 12, to send your Lordship another Report, containing merely the first three paragraphs of our Report of March 7, and we may be permitted to add that it will afford us sincere pleasure if your Lordship shall receive from Mr. Hornby a most satisfactory explanation.

Report from the Law Officers, to be substituted for their Report dated March 7, 1861, printed at page 46.

Doctors' Commons, April 25, 1861.

My Lord,

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd of February last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a letter which your Lordship had received from Mrs. Parry, dated February 2, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Hornby, the Judge in the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, in the case of her husband, who had been arrested at the suit of Mr. James Crawford, for the non-payment of a sum of money which Mr. Crawford had expended in repairing certain buildings on a farm belonging to Mr. Parry, of which he had taken a lease, and which sum had been decided to be due to Mr. Crawford by a sentence of the Supreme Consular Court.

Mr. Hammond also transmitted a despatch from Mr. Hornby (No. 12), explaining the course pursued by him with regard to this matter, and was pleased to request that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion upon this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have carefully considered the above-mentioned papers, and have the honour to report—

That we think it right that a copy of Mrs. Parry's letter be immediately transmitted to Mr. Hornby, and that he be requested to give specific answers to the statements therein.

We also recommend that Mr. Legal Vice-Consul Wroth be desired to transmit a copy of his notes, taken on the trial of Crawford v. Parry, and to report to your Lordship his opinion on the case.

There certainly appears to us to be matter in this case which demands the most serious inquiry.

My Lord,

JAPAN.

Trial of Mr. Moss in the Consular Court at Kanagawa for going out shooting, and for assaulting and wounding a Japanese officer sent to apprehend him.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 22nd of March last, in which he stated that he was directed by you to transmit to us certain papers therein mentioned respecting the case of Mr. Moss,* a British subject, who had been tried, in the British Consular Court at Kanagawa, in Japan, on a charge of going out shooting, contrary to the laws of Japan, and of assaulting and wounding a Japanese officer sent to apprehend him.

Mr. Hammond informs us that the defendant was sentenced by the Consul to deportation from the country, and to a fine of 1,000 dollars, which sentence was confirmed by the Consul-General at Yeddo, who, however, further adjudged the prisoner to be imprisoned for three months at Hong Kong.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that we would take this case into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with such observations as we may have to offer thereupon; and added, for our information, with reference to the subsequent release of Mr. Moss from prison (on the ground that the Order in Council of January 23, 1860, was not in force in the Colony of Hong Kong), that it has been ascertained that, through an oversight on the part of the Council Office, that Order was not at the time communicated to the Colonial Department.

We were further honoured with a letter from Mr. Hammond of the 25th of March last, stating that the point raised in the correspondence of the Governor of Hong Kong in regard to the Letters-Patent by which the Supreme Court in that Colony is empowered to take cognizance of questions arising out of the Japanese Order in Council, will in the first instance be considered by the Duke of Newcastle, and that our attention need not be directed to that point, but merely to the special case of Mr. Moss; and when that is disposed of, the correspondence of the British Consul at Kanagawa with the British Residents at that place.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, we have carefully considered the whole of the papers transmitted to us for our consideration, and have the honour to report that—

1. As to the trial of Mr. Moss, we think that there was evidence to warrant the finding of these two facts—first, that Mr. Moss had gone out shooting; and secondly, that, returning from his sport, being assailed by certain Japanese, his gun was discharged by him, and an officer of the Tycoon seriously wounded.

It was, however, a very inexpedient course to make these two matters (so widely different in their nature and gravity), the subject of one conjoint accusation. With respect to these two acts, we are of opinion that the mere act of "going out shooting" by a British subject in Japan, was not an offence cognizable by the Consular Court there; for, with the exceptions mentioned in the 30th section of the Order in Council of the 23rd January, 1860 (and no one of which applies to the present case), those acts alone are to constitute crimes when committed by British subjects in Japan, which, if done in England, would have been punishable as crimes by Courts having criminal jurisdiction at home. But the mere act of going out with the appliances and for the purpose of shooting, is not a crime in England; nor can a violation of the game laws in England, by shooting game without a license, be regarded as a crime in the sense of that word as used in the Order in Council.

It is true that the act of going out shooting with fire-arms is a violation of the Japanese municipal law; and in our opinion the Consul might and ought to have availed himself of his power, under the 4th and 5th sections of the Order in Council, to make and publish "Rules and regulations for the peace, order, and good government of Her Majesty's subjects being within the dominions of the Tycoon of Japan;" and such rules, &c., might very properly have included a prohibition against shooting, carrying fire-arms on the person, and other dangerous or inconvenient violations of the municipal law of the place, provided that such law was not in itself either unjust or unreasonable.

Rules and regulations should, without delay, be framed and published, on full and careful consideration of the requirements of the case.

The Notification of the 4th November, 1859, was issued previous to the date of the alleged offence; but it is not a "rule or regulation," enforceable by "fine or imprisonment," within Article IV of the Order in Council.

The further and more serious charge against Mr. Moss, which was entertained by the Consul, that of wounding the officer of the Tycoon, and shooting at him with intent to do him grievously bodily harm, proceeded on the assumption that the officer was, when wounded, engaged in a lawful attempt to apprehend a criminal. But Mr. Moss having, as we have pointed out, committed no act which, according to the terms of the Treaty and of the Order in Council, was criminal in him, the Japanese officer had no legal authority to apprehend Mr. Moss; and the latter was, according to English law, justified in resisting the attempt to arrest him, and was not, at all events, guilty of the aggravated assault and wounding with which he was charged.

2. As to the sentence on Mr. Moss.

The sentence pronounced by Mr. Consul Vyse appears to us to have been a legal sentence, under sections 20 and 26 of the Order in Council, assuming the conviction to have been proper; except that we think he had no power to include "costs" as part of the sentence.

We are further of opinion that the Consul-General had no power, under the 30th section, to couple imprisonment, as a part of Mr. Moss's punishment, with the fine of 1,000 dollars. His power to "vary" the punishment awarded by the Consul cannot, we think, extend to exceed the maximum punishment which it is in the power of the subordinate Consular officer to inflict, namely, imprisonment for twelve months, or a fine of 1,000 dollars.

3. As to the Letters-Patent, dated the 30th January, 1860.

The error pointed out in the letter of Chief Justice Adams, of January 31, 1861, ought, we think, to be corrected without delay; and we have no doubt that this will receive the prompt attention of Her Majesty's Government.

4. With respect to the correspondence between Consul Vyse and the British residents, it proves the urgent necessity of a well-considered Code of Rules and Regulations, by which a breach of such Japanese laws and usages as are reasonable in themselves should be made punishable to a moderate extent, and in express and appropriate legal terms, by the Consul. Until such a code is published, mere breaches of Japanese laws or customs, however calculated to produce collision or mischief, will not be, ipso facto, offences for which Her Majesty's subjects can be punished.

We invite attention to the barbarous treatment of Mr. Moss by the Japanese officers, and to the necessity of a stipulation that any British subject arrested by Japanese authority should be immediately brought and delivered to the custody of the Consul.

Sale of the cargo of the "Mio Zio" at Port Mahon.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th April instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 14th of February last,* respecting the case of the "Mio Zio," he was directed to transmit to me, together with the previous papers, a letter from Mr. Blake, dated the 23rd of April, 1861, stating the present circumstances of this case, and requesting the interference of Her Majesty's Government in order to prevent the sale of the cargo; and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which Her Majesty's Government should pursue.

I am also honoured with Mr. Hammond's letter of the 25th April instant, transmitting a further despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Mahon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it appears from Consul Peel's No. 8 (20th April) that the Superior Court at Palma has confirmed the judgment of the Inferior Court at Port Mahon, to the effect that "the maize is unfit for shipment," and the owners intend appealing from Palma to Madrid.

Under these circumstances, and pending such appeal, I cannot advise your Lordship to interfere to prevent the sale of the cargo: possibly the appeal to Madrid may prevent this sale; but if the sale takes place, the Consul may be instructed to secure the clearest evidence as to the condition of the maize being perfectly fit for shipment, with a view to ulterior measures.

The case should be recommended to the special attention of the Legation at Madrid, to which the Consul's Report of the 25th of February should be transmitted; and although Her Majesty's Government cannot technically appear or intervene in the suit, the Legation should cause the case to be carefully watched; and when it is decided, should furnish a clear business-like Report (with Spanish legal assistance if requisite),—

1st. Of the circumstances and merits of the case of the cargo of the "Mio Zio."

2ndly. Of the operation of the system of law and procedure under which this particular species of fraud is carried out.

3rdly. Of the best and easiest reform or remedy which may be applicable thereto, with a view to a friendly representation to the Spanish Government.

On the subject of the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to interfere in this particular case, I must observe that the "Mio Zio" is a Roman vessel; that Mr. Robinson (the British owner of the cargo) did not apparently acquire it until after the commencement of the voyage, by purchase from a Greek firm in England (the original consignees); that the owner, by his British agent, litigated and appealed the case, and acted contrary to the advice of the British Consul at Port Mahon, who suggested an application to the Military Governor (an officer who in Spain, as "Captain-General," has a peculiar jurisdiction over all foreigners). Under such circumstances the impropriety and inutility of any official intervention of Her Majesty's Government pendente lite, in order to prevent the carrying out of a decree or order of a Spanish Court, such as is suggested by Mr. Blake in his letter of the 23rd April, will be apparent.

Non-validity of marriage by civil contract without performance of religious ceremony.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 29, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Santo Domingo (No. 8), inclosing a Decree issued by General Santana, directing that no marriage by civil contract shall be considered valid without the performance of the religious ceremony.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state, that as Mr. Hood anticipates that this Decree is likely to interfere with the rights and privileges of British subjects, he was to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be addressed to Mr. Hood upon the subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I must observe, that the portion of the Dominican Republic which was under the control of General Santana has, I believe, been recently delivered up to Spain; and that this matter may thus, at present, be subject to special considerations in relation thereto.

Subject to this remark, I can only say that several different questions arise upon this Decree, as to which I must request further and more specific information before I can advise Her Majesty's Government what course to adopt:—

1st. I observe that the question of the legal or constitutional power of General Santana to alter the law of the Republic by a Decree made by virtue of his own sole authority seems open to some doubt, and this point must be cleared up.

2ndly. A copy of the Decree of the 15th July, 1848, referred to in Article I of the above Decree (January 19, 1861), should be furnished, with explanations.

3rdly. There is no explicit statement from the Consul of the authority upon which, or mode in which, the validity of marriages in the Republic by civil contract, even where both parties were Roman Catholics, or one party only was a Roman Catholic, and where both were natives or citizens, or where one or both were British subjects or foreigners, was legally secured or admitted before the Decree; nor is the form of such recognized civil contract indicated. This portion of the Consul's letter evidently requires, on the face of it, further elucidation.

4thly. The Decree does not, in my opinion, constitute a breach of the Treaty. I am at a loss to understand how the right of marrying by civil contract can be considered as included in Article VIII of the Treaty of 1850. It is only in very modern times that any such right has been established (by statute altering the common law) in England.

5thly. The principal question is, the state of the law as to the validity of marriages by civil contract in the Republic of Dominica, especially as applicable to British subjects, previous to the Decree, and the consequent extent and effect thereupon of the alteration thereby made. I must observe that, in the abstract, there is nothing contrary to reason, or to international comity or usage, in the law of a Roman Catholic country refusing to recognize any other than a regular Roman Catholic marriage where either spouse is a Roman Catholic.

As at present advised, I confess that I cannot see any solid or sufficient ground for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. If, however, the practical operation of the Decree will be retrospective, or otherwise so seriously oppressive to Her Majesty's subjects as to call for interference, this may alter my opinion.

I would suggest that, if Consul Hood thinks it necessary or desirable, he should obtain the most competent legal assistance in furnishing the necessary information, first, as to the state of the law previously to, or independently of, the Decree; secondly, as to the validity and operation of the Decree; thirdly, as to the practical effect thereof, more especially in cases where one or both the spouses are British subjects, and may have celebrated a British Consular marriage in the Republic; lastly, it is possible that there may be other Powers interested in this question (such, for instance, as the United States, Prussia, and Holland), who may have Representatives in the Republic. The Consul should, in this event, ascertain and state the view taken of this Decree by such Representatives.

Apprehension of fugitive offenders in foreign countries.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, April 30, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th April instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying letter from the Colonial Office, dated March 28, 1861, inclosing an Act passed by the Legislature of Canada, entitled "An Act respecting the 96th Chapter of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, respecting the Apprehension of Fugitive Offenders in Foreign Countries;" and to request that we would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion whether there is any objection to leaving this Act to its operation.

In compliance with your Lordship's instructions we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, in our opinion, there is nothing contrary to law or justice in the Act passed by the Legislature of Canada, and to which our attention has been directed by Mr. Hammond's letter; and we, therefore, see no objection to leaving it to its operation.

Spanish Consular jurisdiction in Morocco.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 1, 1861.

WITH reference to Mr. Hammond's letter of the 29th April ultimo, on the subject of Spanish Consular jurisdiction in Morocco, I desire to point out—

1. The note of Señor Collantes to Sir A. Buchanan, dated April 1, 1861 (Inclosure No. 2 in No. 137), alludes to a note of Sir A. Buchanan, "dated 6th October last." This is, I presume, an error for "6th September" last, and alludes to the note from Mr. Edwards to Señor Collantes, dated 6th September (Inclosure in Mr. Edwards' No. 122); if not, I request further information.

2. The last-mentioned note of Señor Collantes (1st April, 1861) alludes to a note of Sir A. Buchanan's of the 29th March, 1860, which latter note I cannot find, and with which I must request to be supplied.

3. Draft No. 43 to Mr. Edwards refers to a despatch, No. 283, from Sir A. Buchanan of May 20, 1860, which is stated to have contained Señor Collantes' "reply" to certain representations of Sir A. Buchanan; I cannot find either No. 283 or Señor Collantes' reply (not dated or numbered).

I have therefore returned these papers, and must request to have the various official communications which have passed directly between the Government of Spain and that of Her Majesty, placed together in one bundle, and in a consecutive series; as, until this is done, it is impossible to ascertain the precise state and position of this international controversy.

MOSQUITO.

Mosquito land claims.*

* See also page 65.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th April ultimo, stating that various subjects of Her Majesty assume to have claims to land formerly and now in the occupation of the Mosquito Indians; and that the nature of those claims is explained in a Report of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, dated November 24, 1851, and in a Report presented to the Secretary of State in the year 1849, by two gentlemen who had been appointed to inquire into them; copies of these papers were inclosed.*

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state, that under the Treaties with Honduras and Nicaragua, those claims, instead of being, as formerly, to be preferred against the Mosquito Ruler alone, are now to be preferred severally, in certain proportions, against the Governments of the two Republics and the Mosquito Ruler.

That the time having arrived for making arrangements for deciding upon these claims, your Lordship has caused to be prepared drafts of instructions to Mr. Green, Her Majesty's Consul at Greytown, with reference to the claims on Nicaragua and the Mosquito King, and that your Lordship has already desired Her Majesty's Consul at Comayagua to make a communication to the Government of Honduras on the subject.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that your Lordship considers that some notice of the intention to proceed to the examination of the claims should be inserted in the "London Gazette," and that drafts of such notices have been prepared accordingly.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state, that in transmitting to me these drafts, he was to request that I would take them into consideration, and report my opinion on the course which it is proposed to pursue, and on the manner in which it is proposed that public notice should be given of the intended course.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I beg to refer to my Report of April 16th ultimo on a portion of this subject. With reference to that portion of the papers which relates to the "Mosquito reserve," or territory of the Mosquito Ruler or King, I observe that Article I of the Treaty with Nicaragua, January 28, 1860, "recognizes as belonging to and under the sovereignty of the Republic of Nicaragua, the country hitherto occupied or claimed by the Mosquito Indians within the frontier of that Republic," whatever that frontier may be; and Her Majesty stipulates that "the British Protectorate of that part of the Mosquito territory shall cease three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty."

Article II stipulates that a district within the territory of the Republic of Nicaragua shall be assigned to the Mosquito Indians, "which district shall remain, as above stipulated, under the sovereignty of the Republic of Nicaragua." The district is then defined; and it is further stipulated that "it may not be ceded by the Indians to any foreign person or State, but shall be and remain under the sovereignty of the Republic of Nicaragua."

Articles III, IV (as to future "absolute incorporation" of the Mosquito Indians with the Republic), V, VI, VIII, and IX of the Treaty, are also deserving of consideration.

By this Treaty the King of Mosquito has become (as it would be called in Germany) "mediatized;" his sovereignty is abolished; the "Mosquito reserve" seems to be placed almost in the position of private property, as regards foreign Governments. Not only can it not be ceded to any foreign person, but it is to remain under the "sovereignty of the Republic of Nicaragua;" and by Article IV the Indians and their "reserve" may at any time agree to absolute incorporation into the Republic on the same footing as other citizens of the Republic, subjecting themselves to be governed by the general law and regulations of the Republic;" including those as to land, even quoad "the Mosquito reserve."

---

* Mr. Green, No. 5, January 31, 1861; Ditto, No. 6, February 1, 1861; Ditto, No. 7, February 1, 1861.

Under these circumstances, even if no steps towards incorporation have been taken, the Republic probably looks to such incorporation, and may be considered to have acquired a species of vested or inchoate interest or right in the reserve, over which she has the legal and actual sovereignty. She will probably claim to ratify and confirm any grants of land, or other public acts of the King or Chiefs, or the Indians, who will probably, not of themselves, independently of her, have the means or machinery necessary for carrying out any important or binding obligations, either with Her Majesty's Government, or with British subjects, especially as to land claims. The position of all parties is, at all events, somewhat peculiar; and it will probably be of little avail for Her Majesty's Government to settle these claims on the Mosquito reserve separately, as between Her Majesty and the Mosquito Ruler, unless the cordial concurrence of Nicaragua, and her formal and binding assent both to such settlement and to the subsequently carrying it into full effect, can be ensured.

Mr. Green, at page 7 in No. 6 (February 1, 1861), adverts to this difficulty; he proposes in that despatch, as I understand it, the payment of a pecuniary compensation to the bonâ fide grantees of land in the Mosquito reserve, to be secured as therein pointed out; but it is obvious (as is remarked by Mr. Hammond, in his draft to the Consul), that this mode of settlement would not provide for the "quieting of titles" in the case of existing bonâ fide grants of land, now occupied under such grants (if there be any such), nor can I see the justice of compelling such grantees (in effect) to cede their lands in consideration of a money payment.

I observe, moreover, from Consul Green's despatch No. 6, that the total value of claims against the Mosquito Indians cannot exceed 10,000*l.* sterling.

Under these circumstances, therefore, I am not satisfied of the expediency of now treating the Mosquito Chief (in effect) as a Sovereign Power, and putting him on the same footing in this matter as the Republic of Nicaragua, by enabling him to name a Commissioner, Arbitrator, and so forth, which seems to me scarcely necessary under the circumstances.

The settlement of the claims against Nicaragua and Honduras may probably (in effect) dispose of some of the claims against the Mosquito reserve, which may depend on the same original grant or title; if this is probable, Her Majesty's Government should wait for such settlement, before entering upon the claims against the reserve separately.

If this is not so, it would seem to me that an advertisement might be issued for all claimants to lands within the reserve to send in their claims to Her Majesty's Consulate at Greytown before a particular date; and that, when Her Majesty's Government was thus in possession of the number, extent, and nature of those claims, it might deal with their settlement according to circumstances, with Nicaragua, or with the Mosquito Chief, and possibly, without all the formalities of a Convention, Arbitrator, Umpire, and so forth.

Thus Her Majesty's Government may, first, satisfy itself of the validity and amount of the claims against the reserve, applying to the King or Chiefs for any information it may require, without making him or them formal parties to a compact, and may then act according to circumstances, so as to secure a satisfactory arrangement.

Upon this subject, therefore, I have abstained from settling the drafts, and I have the honour to await your Lordship's further instructions.

I have, &c.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th April ultimo, in which he stated that, with reference to the opinion given by two of us on the case of the Belgian vessel "Rubis" as submitted by the Secretary to the Treasury, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a note from the Belgian Minister at this Court giving the particulars as to the national character of the "Rubis," which were requested by your Lordship in the note of which a draft is inclosed; and to request that we would take these papers into our consideration, together with the case herewith returned, and that we would acquaint your Lordship, at our earliest convenience, with our opinion whether the information now furnished by M. Van de Weyer does not show that the "Rubis" is entitled to be treated as a man-of-war, and is therefore exempt from the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are of opinion that the information furnished by M. Van de Weyer shows that the "Rubis" is clearly entitled to be treated as a Belgian man-of-war, and that she is exempt from the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court.

Tax levied at Panamá and at Colon on agencies of the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 18th of April ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Panamá (No. 9, March 2), respecting the tax which has been levied by the Government of the State of Panamá on the Agencies of the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company at that place and at Colon; and to request that I would take into consideration the circumstances of this case, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in interfering in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I cannot, on the face of this "Statement," see anything to call for, or to justify, the interference of Her Majesty's Government.

The subject of this tax would seem to have been previously submitted to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government (although this circumstance is not alluded to in the Statement), and the Company in question has never yet supplied the necessary information to enable Her Majesty's Government to understand the grounds of its claim to exemption. I beg to refer to my Reports of December 13, 1856, February 3 and March 27, 1857, from which this is apparent.

I do not even now understand whether this Statement is drawn up by the Consul as a Report, pursuant to his instructions, or whether, although transmitted by the Consul, it is, in fact, supplied by an agent of the Company: this should be explained.

I cannot, however, see that the Statement establishes any case for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government. It appears that a similar tax to that now in question has been imposed and paid since 1850, and that this particular tax has been in operation since 1857.

I am not aware, and it is not stated, that any other person, or firm, or Company in Panamá, save only the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company, has hitherto complained of its illegality; and I must observe that the Company, which is an English Joint Stock Company, with (I presume) a Board of Directors in London, is perfectly able to state and to support its own case, which it evinces a somewhat singular reluctance to do.

I cannot discover from the extract of the Law of 1857, or the other papers annexed to the Statement, any clear grounds for exemption. The Company seems to be included under the words, "Companies of Navigation or their Agencies;" and there is not even a legal opinion produced to the effect that it is not so included, or is exempt, or that the tax is illegal as not being one which the State of Panamá (as distinct from the Federal Government) is competent to impose, although this is suggested. I can discover no trace of the Company having, in its own character, and on its own behalf, ever hitherto formally and directly raised the point with the local authorities, as by legal proceedings, formal appeal, or otherwise; and under these circumstances, I can see no ground for official intervention.

NEW GRANADA.

Liability of importers to pay over again to Central Government duties already collected by the de facto Government.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 18th April ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from the Acting British Consul at Carthagena, New Granada, inclosing a Decree issued by the de facto Government at that place, declaring certain ports, which the Central Government had ordered to be closed, to be open to commerce, and inquiring whether, in the event of the re-establishment of the authority of the Central Government, importers would be liable to be called upon by the Central Government to pay over again the amount of duties already collected by the de facto authorities.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to inclose, for my information, a copy of a note from Judge Black to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, stating the opinion of the United States' Government with regard to a similar question, which might arise from the present state of affairs in South Carolina; and to request that I would inform your Lordship what answer should, in my opinion, be returned to Mr. Druce's despatch.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That as to the question affecting the ports of New Granada, I can only refer to my Reports of November 21, 1859, and May 18 and November 22, 1860, upon this subject: and I must repeat, that being still without any sort of explanation or statement of facts (for which I have so often applied), I cannot offer an opinion, more especially in the absence of any particular case, in which any intelligible point of law or fact is specifically raised. I beg to refer especially to the conclusion of my Report of November 22, 1860. If Her Majesty's Legations and Consulates in South America will not supply the necessary information in such cases as this, they must be left without instructions until they do supply it, or until a case arises in which it is supplied from some other quarter.

In the present case, for instance, Her Majesty's Government seems to have been left uninformed as to the facts, dates, and so forth, for upwards of eighteen months; Consul Druce's despatch of the 4th March last is (by itself) quite unintelligible to me; the ports in question have not (as I understand the facts) ever been blockaded or actually "closed," but have been long occupied by the insurgents, and have always, in such occupation, remained open to commerce, and, I presume, upon payment of the regularly established duties; how, therefore, they have been "closed" by the Central Government (except upon paper), or "re-opened by the rebel Chief Mosquera," when never closed by him, or what practical effect upon British interests, and upon the payment of duties, this (so-called) "closing" or "re-opening" has actually produced, is left in perfect obscurity; no application whatsoever from any British subject is forthcoming: there is no statement as to what duties have been levied by the one party, or what are threatened by the other; and the matter is simply unintelligible.

If, however (as is probably the case), my inability to understand the case is simply owing to my ignorance, and if the facts are well known at the Foreign Office, I have to request a full and specific statement of them, and one or more distinct questions thereupon.

At the same time I must observe that it may not be advisable to pledge Her Majesty's Government beforehand, and merely upon an hypothesis, to resist in any event the repayment of duties, or to give official notice to Her Majesty's subjects that they now act at their peril in trading at these ports, and subject to the risk of being possibly hereafter compelled to pay over again the amount of duties already paid; and I do not see how the Consul's question can be effectually answered, without doing one or the other.

1861

With respect to the note (dated January 8th) from Judge Black (whoever he may be) to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, it seems to me to amount to a refusal on the part of the Federal Government of the United States to give any definite answer whatever to the question put by Lord Lyons.

The Federal Government generally reserves all its rights (whatever they may be) to Customs duties at the Southern revolted ports; sed non constat in what mode or under what circumstances it will (if at all) enforce them against British subjects or goods.

This letter, therefore, throws no light upon the course to be hereafter taken in New Granada, in the event of repayment of duties already paid at the ports being demanded by the Central Government.

There is thus no information on this essential point from New Granada, or from Washington, and I can only request that, if my opinion is still required, the particular facts upon which it is required may be distinctly stated.

Apprehension of certain Societies lest the Order in Council of 9th October, 1860, should cause embarrassments to Christian missionaries in Ottoman dominions.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 7, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 24th April ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a letter which the Earl of Shaftesbury had forwarded from the Secretaries of the Society for the Conversion of the Jews, and of the Church Missionary Society, stating that it was apprehended that the portion of the Levant Order in Council of the 9th October, 1860, which affects questions of a religious nature, is worded in such a manner as to cause possible embarrassments to Christian missionaries in the Ottoman dominions; and your Lordship accordingly requested that we would take the matter into our consideration, and report to you our opinion as to whether any, and, if so, what steps should be taken on this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the matter into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we do not see any reasonable grounds for apprehending that sections 49 and 50 of the Order in Council of the 27th of August, 1860, will be used, as suggested in this letter, "against Christian missionaries when engaged in the peaceful and legitimate prosecution of their work."

We observe that the letter does not point out any instance in which this has been done, or explain the particular cases or circumstances in which it is imminent, or even apprehended that it will be done; nor does the letter state that any missionary or other person residing in the Turkish dominions has addressed any specific complaint or statement on the subject to either of the Societies whose Secretaries subscribe the letter.

The Order in Council and Rules were passed on the 27th of August, 1860, but did not come into effect until the 1st of March, 1861, in order to afford time for remonstrances or observations from the parties to be thereby affected; none such have as yet come to our knowledge. These sections were introduced in consequence of an outrage committed by British officers in a mosque at Cairo.

All the rules and regulations for carrying the Order in Council into effect are (by Section 66) to be approved, exhibited, and sold as therein directed.

We cannot anticipate that any missionary "engaged in the peaceful and legitimate prosecution of his work" will be proceeded against under the Order; but should he unfortunately violate its provisions, there is no reason for exempting him from its operation. Under these circumstances we cannot advise your Lordship to enter a correspondence involving abstract legal and political questions, of some nicety, with the Secretaries of Missionary Societies; and we do not see the necessity of any peculiar steps being taking in the matter.

Claim of Mr. R. Duffy for losses sustained during the war between the Argentine and Uruguayan Republics in 1842.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 7, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd April ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Panamá (No. 22, 1st March), respecting a claim preferred by Mr. Richard Duffy, a British subject, on account of losses which he sustained in 1842 from the war between the Argentine and Uruguayan Republics; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to whether there is any ground for interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government in this case, and, if so, what instructions should be given to Mr. Thornton thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the relations between the South American Republics on the Rio de la Plata, inter se, and the international position in which they have at various times stood towards Great Britain, have been so peculiar that I may not have rightly understood the legal state and condition of this claim, in which case I must request more explicit information on the subject.

Subject to this observation, I must remark that as a general principle of international law, and in the absence of express stipulation contrà, the Government of a country which has suffered from foreign invasion cannot be held responsible to foreign residents or Governments for damage or destruction of property inflicted on them by the forces of the invading army. Such results arise, inter hostes, from the fortune (or rather misfortune) of war, in which all persons domiciled in a belligerent country are involved: plectuntur Achivi—it is true that the innocent and the stranger suffers; but inasmuch as his sufferings cannot be attributed to the Government of the (invaded) country of his choice, that Government cannot be expected or required to compensate him.

This principle appears to apply to Mr. Duffy's claim against the Argentine Confederation (which Republic, I presume, is what Mr. Thornton means by the words "this Republic"); and the decision of the Commissioners under the Convention ratified at Panamá, March 27, 1860, (which is, I presume, that alluded to by Mr. Thornton as "the Convention of 1858"), seems to me correct.

Mr. Duffy was not (as I understand his case) "a British subject who had suffered losses in the commotions of civil war which had befallen the Republic," within the true intent and meaning of this Convention; but I merely offer this as an opinion formed without any accurate knowledge of the facts.

With reference to Mr. Duffy's claim against the Republic of Uruguay (which is, I presume, what Mr. Thornton means by the "Monte Videan Government"), whose invading army actually caused Mr. Duffy's losses in Entre Rios, I observe no allusion by Mr. Thornton to the date when the claim was preferred against this Republic; to the view originally taken of it by Her Majesty's Government; or to the Agreement of June 23, 1857, for the settlement of claims of English and French subjects "on account of losses suffered during the war" (whatever this may mean).

If Mr. Duffy's claim was presented to the Commissioners under this agreement, and rejected, it was, I fear, by the terms of the agreement (Article 1) "definitively settled as to its justification and amount;" if not, the time for presenting it has elapsed.

It arose in 1842, and the silence of Her Majesty's Government upon it hitherto requires explanation.

Apart from this Agreement I cannot see any solid ground upon which the claim can be supported against the Republic of the Uruguay, more especially at this date, and considering that Mr. Duffy was permanently domiciled in Entre Dios.

The principle involved is, however, very important as affecting British interests in South America, and there is at least one other British claim of the same class; and the relations of these countries inter se and towards Great Britain, and their arrangements as to British claims upon them, have been and are peculiar. Mr. Thornton's despatch throws very little light upon the question.

He does not complain of the adverse decision of the Argentine Commission: he does not complain of the rejection of the claim by Uruguay; he does not state that the settlement of this peculiar class of claims was ever contemplated or intended to be included in either Convention; he does not state that any foreign Government has successfully supported similar claims; he, nevertheless, seems to view the claim as clearly valid, and only asks "from which of the two Governments Mr. Duffy is entitled to expect compensation for his losses whenever they may be legally proved?"

I can only say that, apart from express stipulation (unless I have misunderstood the facts), Mr. Duffy would not, in the absence of any Treaty stipulation, be entitled to compensation from either Government: not from the Argentine Confederation, for the reasons I have above stated; nor from the Republic of the Uruguay, since in war all persons remaining domiciled in the enemy's country, whatever their origin, are considered as enemies, and their property as res hostium; but if I have not fully understood the facts, if his case is within the equity of any special stipulation, or if similar claims of other foreigners have been conceded by either Government, I must request further information.

Mr. Hornby's instructions to the Consul and Legal Vice-Consul at Smyrna.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 8, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 15th of April ultimo, stating that Mr. Hornby, Judge of Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, having been desired to prepare drafts of instructions to the Consul and Legal Vice-Consul at Smyrna, to be issued to those officers under the signature of the Secretary of State, he was directed to transmit to us the draft which Mr. Hornby has drawn up; and to request that we would report to your Lordship whether in our opinion they may properly be adopted by your Lordship.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, generally speaking, we see nothing objectionable in either of these drafts.

With respect to the precise division of duties between the Consul and the Legal Vice-Consul, we have to observe that it is, in our opinion, essential to the proper administration of justice that the Legal Vice-Consul's duties should be confined, as far as practicable, most strictly to those immediately connected with his important and peculiar judicial position; and that serious public detriment will ensue, and the very object of his appointment will be exposed to failure, if he attempts to discharge ordinary Consular duties, or to embark in or mix himself up in the ordinary Consular discussions and difficulties, with the local authorities, foreign Consulates, and individuals. We have adverted to this point (as regards Mr. Hornby) in our Report of the 22nd of September, 1860, and we beg to invite your Lordship's particular attention to the expediency of avoiding any mischief of this kind in the first establishment of a Judicial officer at Smyrna.

He should be especially instructed to bear in mind his high and independent position as Judge, and representative of the Supreme Consular Court; entrusted with legal and equitable jurisdiction, and powers of great extent and variety; deprived of that control of professional and public opinion, and those opportunities for consultation with other Judges, which are enjoyed in this country; and representing, amongst Mahometan and European foreigners, the dignity and integrity of the British judicature.

He should cautiously beware of mixing himself up in his private and individual capacity with, or even discussing or expressing opinions, or offering advice on, any matters which there is any reason to suppose may subsequently come before the Court judicially.

He should attend carefully to section 5 of the Order in Council of August 27, 1860; and should bear in mind that all questions of procedure, remedies, and execution of judgments, are to be decided by and according to the British (Consular) law and system exclusively: thus, although the interpretation of a contract made (say) in France or Ionia will be according to the French or Ionian law, the proceedings and remedy thereon, and its enforcement, will be regulated by the British (Consular) law and system exclusively.

He has no power to administer any law excepting English law, modified by the custom of the Levant; and he has no power or jurisdiction to administer or enforce Ionian law, whether criminal or civil, even between Ionians, or by acquiescence or consent.

We recommend that the substance of these remarks should be added to the draft instructions to the Legal Vice-Consul

Mr. Hornby's report of proceedings of the Consular Court at Constantinople in 1860.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 9, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd April last, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit the inclosed Report from Mr. Hornby (No. 13, February 18), respecting the proceedings of the Consular Court at Constantinople in the year 1860.

Your Lordship was pleased to direct our attention to three points, viz.:—

1. The imperfections of the Local Courts and the measures by which Mr. Hornby considers those imperfections may be amended.

2. The manner in which the concession made on the part of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the expulsion by Turkish authority of British subjects from Constantinople is acted upon by the Porte, with reference to which matter Mr. Hammond transmitted to us the correspondence after which that concession was made; and

3. The practice which appears to have grown up on the part of the Turkish authorities of remitting, for the decision of the Supreme Council, questions which ought to be determined by the ordinary tribunals acting in concurrence with a British Consular authority.

On these several points your Lordship was pleased to request our opinion with a view to the instructions to be given on them, either to Her Majesty's Ambassador or to Mr. Hornby.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That we have considered the Report inclosed in Mr. Hammond's letter, from Mr. Hornby, respecting the proceedings of the Consular Court at Constantinople in the year 1860, and,

1. We do not recommend the adoption of any measure in the sense suggested by Mr. Hornby at page 9, with reference to Austrians voluntarily submitting to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

2. With reference to the alleged imperfections of the Local Courts, and the measures by which Mr. Hornby considers those imperfections may be amended, we understand Mr. Hornby's suggestion to be, in substance, the substitution in the Mixed Courts, and with a view to a just administration, as regards British subjects, of a permanent Judge, in lieu of the foreign merchants, who, under existing Treaties, sit as Judges along with the Turkish Judges, in those cases in which foreigners are interested. Accepting Mr. Hornby's statement of the inconveniences and injustice of which the present system is made the occasion, we see no objection to so much of the new scheme proposed by Mr. Hornby. We do not feel it to be within our province to advert to considerations of the expense and the like, in carrying out the plan, should it be approved by Her Majesty's Government.

It is obvious that the consent of the Turkish Government, by a fresh Treaty, will be requisite to any such change; and, beyond the substitution of a permanent Judge for foreign merchants, attending at various times, we do not see how the Porte can be fairly called upon to make any change in the composition of the Court of the Tidjaret.

The Court being a Turkish Court, it seems to us to be equally unreasonable to expect, and unwise to ask for, a "procedure" framed on that of the Consular Courts.

3. With reference to the conduct of the Turkish authorities in regard to the summary expulsion of British subjects from Constantinople, we beg to refer to our opinions on that subject of the 16th May and 7th July, 1860. We also entirely concur in the propriety of the instructions as to the course to be pursued with regard to the expulsion of vagabonds, being British subjects, from Constantinople, contained in the letter from the Foreign Office to Sir Henry Bulwer of the 23rd August, 1860.

In the part of Mr. Hornby's Report which relates to this subject he appears to us to confound his own judicial function and the diplomatic authority of the British Ambassador.

It is not for the Judge of the Supreme Consular Court, but for the Ambassador, to be satisfied that the misconduct of a British subject, assigned by the Turkish Executive as the ground for intended summary deportation, is not a criminal offence ordinarily cognizable, and yet is such as to render the deportation just and reasonable with regard to the safety and tranquillity of the country.

As Mr. Hornby speaks for himself only, and does not profess to represent the experience or views of the Embassy at Constantinople, we are unable to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion as to whether, in this respect, the Turkish Government has or has not acted in good faith, and according to the course so clearly described in the letter, already referred to, of the 23rd August, 1860.

The imprisonment of such persons alluded to by Mr. Hornby deserves the vigilant attention of Her Majesty's Embassy, which should call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to any case of abuse.

With reference to the practice described of remitting questions to the Supreme Council, such practice appears to us to be in violation of Article 42 of the Capitulations; and, so far as we are able to judge, the case would seem to be one for a serious and firm remonstrance with the Turkish Government, with the object of securing, for the future, a fair and full observance of the letter and spirit of the Article in question.

It does not occur to us to make any observations on any other points in Mr. Hornby's Report.

Claim of Messrs. Ede and Co. for repayment of money advanced to Turkish Government.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 1st May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter, and its inclosures, from Messrs. Ede and Co., dated April 30, 1861, stating their inability to obtain payment of money advanced by them to the Turkish Government under the circumstances therein set forth, and requesting your Lordship to interfere on their behalf through the Turkish Ambassador at this Court; and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which it would be proper and expedient for Her Majesty's Government to pursue in this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Turkish Government appears to have repeatedly failed to discharge its most formal obligations to Messrs. Ede; and they appear to me to be entitled to expect prompt payment of this debt, with legal interest. Their claim for consequential damages cannot, at present, be formally supported by Her Majesty's Government.

Whether the particular measure which they suggest (viz., an application by your Lordship to the Turkish Ambassador at this Court in their favour) will have any useful result, or will be desirable on public grounds, is a question which I must leave to your Lordship's decision.

I should conceive that Her Majesty's Legation at Constantinople, which has already exerted itself in their favour, would be the proper channel of communication. This is, however, not a legal, but an official question.

Messrs. Ede and Co. appear to me (more especially on behalf of their creditors) to have a claim on the assistance and support of Her Majesty's Government, in whatever shape it will be most readily available, in aiding them to recover payment of a debt so formally acknowledged by, and so long due from, the Sultan's Government, against which they have, I presume, no legal remedy.

Claim of Mr. A. Robinson. Detention of the "Mio Zio" at Port Mahon.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd May instant, stating that, with reference to his letter of the 25th April ultimo, he was directed to transmit to me a further despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Port Mahon (No. 10 of April 27) relative to the case of the "Mio Zio."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I can only refer to my Report of the 27th April ultimo,* and repeat that, although the facts appear very adverse to the judgment of the Superior Court at Palma (now transmitted, and dated the 19th April last), yet that an appeal has, as I understand, been made from that judgment, by the British owner of the cargo, to some superior Tribunal at Madrid, where, I presume, it is now pending. Until, therefore, this appeal is finally disposed of, I do not see how Her Majesty's Government can formally interfere.

The British owner does not deny the jurisdiction of the Spanish Courts over the subject matter, for he has twice appealed, and thereby founded or admitted such jurisdiction. He contends that the decision is either contrary to or unwarranted by the facts, or has been (howsoever) improperly obtained; but Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere, pendente lite, with proceedings actually sub judice in the Spanish Courts, at the instance of Mr. Robinson, as appellant.

If the Spanish Courts should ultimately do him justice, there will be no ground for any interference by Her Majesty's Government; if they should fail to do so, or when they shall have finally and irrevocably refused to do so, the whole question must be considered ab initio by Her Majesty's Government, with a view to any interference which may be expedient.

Codicil of Miss Caroline Cooper's Will, respecting property at Jerusalem.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 30th April ultimo, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 22nd February last† respecting an application from Her Majesty's Consul at Jerusalem (No. 23 of April 6, 1861) as to the course which he should pursue with regard to certain steps which the legal managers in London of the estate of the late Miss Caroline Cooper desire him to take with respect to a codicil to that lady's will, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Mr. Finn (No. 23), containing full information on this subject, and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which should now be pursued in this matter.

The former papers were also inclosed.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I can only repeat the suggestion which I made in my former Report of the 22nd February, 1860, that all the papers should, with this Report, be placed at once in the hands of the Queen's Proctor, who should report to your Lordship what is requisite to be done, after communicating with Messrs. Wadeson and French (who are highly respectable proctors, and who are apparently acting for the executors), and after consulting me, if necessary.

I feel it my duty to point out that, although Mr. Finn seems to have acted properly throughout, yet that he has not, even now, attempted to transmit any clear or business-like statement or explanation of the matter; he merely transmits the correspondence in extenso, as ordered, and does not even point out the particular letter which induced him to write his despatch No. 5 of January 12, 1861, which originated this case.

The information which I requested in my former Report, as to the Consul's official duty or instructions applicable to the case at the date of Miss Cooper's death, is not supplied, and it is desirable that this should be clearly explained to the Queen's Proctor.

Purchase of slaves by a British subject, with a view of ultimately freeing them.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 15, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 26th April ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying despatch from Mr. Christie, Her Majesty's Minister at Rio de Janeiro (Slave Trade, No. 6, March 23, 1861), reporting that a British subject resident at Brazil had, for some years past, from philanthropic motives, been in the habit of purchasing slaves with a view of freeing them after they had repaid him, either by services to himself or by the hire of their services to others, the amount of purchase-money, together with 12 per cent. per annum interest thereon up to the day of their emancipation.

Lord Wodehouse was pleased further to say, that Mr. Christie also stated that this same gentleman had about 100 slaves in his employ, hired from periods varying from one to five years, and he requested that he might receive instructions as to whether the proceedings of this gentleman are legal.

And Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to request that we would take this despatch into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the instructions which it would be proper to give to Mr. Christie in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the despatch into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are of opinion that the conduct of the gentleman in question, in purchasing and holding slaves as stated, is illegal, being in contravention of the Statute 6 and 7 Vict., cap. 98.

It falls within the words "dealing, trading, purchasing, and transferring slaves," contained in that Statute, and makes him liable to the penalties thereby imposed.

UNITED STATES.

Blockade of ports within the Confederate States. Treatment of Secession privateers as pirates.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, May 16, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a despatch from the United States' Secretary of State, dated April 20, 1861, which has been communicated to your Lordship by Mr. Dallas, on the 11th instant, inclosing a copy of a Proclamation by President Lincoln, imposing a blockade of all ports within the Confederate States, and declaring that the United States' Government will hold to be amenable to the laws of the United States for the prevention and punishment of piracy, any person who may molest a vessel of the United States, or the persons or cargo on board of her, under the pretended authority of the Confederate States; and to request that I would take this Proclamation into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

Copies of the Proclamation of President Lincoln, issued on the fall of Fort Sumter, and of the Proclamation of President Davis, in reply thereto, were inclosed for reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I assume it to be the intention of Her Majesty's Government to treat both the Government of the United States, and also that of the "Confederate States," as two de facto separate Sovereign and independent Governments, ut hostes, et belligerentes in justo bello, and to observe the strictest neutrality between them.

Upon this assumption I observe—

1. That President Lincoln's announcement of a blockade of the ports within the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, is not such a notification of blockade as can be favourably recognized as such, inter gentes, or published in the Gazette. It only announces an intention to blockade the ports of those States at some future undefined time.

2. The maintenance of an effective simultaneous and sustained blockade of such a number of ports, so widely distant from each other, and extending from the boundary of North and South Carolina, in latitude 34° north, to the mouth of the Rio Grande del Norte (the boundary of Texas and Mexico), in latitude 26° north, will require the constant employment of a very large and effective naval force, and the exertion of great naval resources, energy, and perseverance. The attention of Her Majesty's naval officers should be invited to the necessity of constantly watching and reporting how and by what force this blockade (when established) is actually maintained off each separate port in the above States.

3. President Lincoln's Proclamation states that "if, with a view to violate such blockade, a vessel shall approach, or shall attempt to leave any of the said ports, she will be duly warned by the commander of one of the blockading vessels, who will endorse on her register the fact and date of such warning; and if the same vessel shall again attempt to enter or leave the blockaded port, she will be captured." The requiring a formal warning to each particular ship, and some subsequent "overt act" of violation on her part, previous to her capture, is rather in accordance with French than with British prize law and practice, which does not consider any such individual and formal warning absolutely necessary to justify capture. The adherence to this particular system of warning will, however, be greatly to the advantage of neutral commerce, and will tend to the diminution of causes of difference between the Federal Government and all neutral Powers; and it is much to be desired that President Lincoln may steadily carry out, in practice, the system thus announced. Possibly your Lordship may consider it advisable to make some formal communication to him in this sense, with a view to pledging him definitely to its observance.

4. With respect to the concluding paragraph of the Proclamation, relating to the treatment of Secession privateers as pirates, I do not consider it necessary at present to enter fully into its consideration. I will merely observe that pirates, jure gentium, are hostes omnium—"common robbers upon the seas," having a general and indiscriminate animus depredandi against all persons in general; which cannot be properly predicted of rebels or insurgents, acting under letters of marque from a de facto sovereign and independent Government, only seeking to capture the property of the subjects or citizens of the particular Government to which they are themselves hostile; and, above all, carrying their prizes into port for legal adjudication. Her Majesty's Government is not concerned as to the treatment which President Lincoln may choose to inflict upon any persons captured in privateers who may not be British subjects; but British subjects who are only hostile "privateersmen," cannot rightfully, when captured as such on the high seas, be treated as pirates, jure gentium, by President Lincoln. The laws of the United States (to which he alludes) cannot rightfully make a British subject guilty of piracy on the high seas merely for serving in a hostile privateer.

It is to be hoped, however, that no necessity may arise for discussing this point.

Slave Trade carried on under the flag of the Confederate States.

WE have been honoured with a letter from Lord Wodehouse of May 14, 1861, in which Lord Wodehouse informs us that he is directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying letter from the Admiralty of May 13, 1861, and to request that we would take Lord Wodehouse's letter into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion at our earliest convenience upon the questions submitted by the Board of Admiralty in their letter above mentioned.

In obedience to the directions of your Lordship we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That upon the first question therein, namely, "whether any further instructions for the guidance of the Commanders of British cruizers engaged in the suppression of the Slave Trade should be sent to the Commanders-in-chief of Her Majesty's naval forces on the West Coast of Africa and in the West Indies, now that the flag of the Southern Confederate States has been recognized as the flag of a belligerent Power;"—we are of opinion that no further instructions will be requisite, except merely information of the fact that the flag of the Southern Confederate States has been and is so recognized.

Upon the second question therein, namely, "whether the co-operation of Commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers with United States' cruizers engaged in the suppression of the Slave Trade is to be continued,"—we are of opinion that such co-operation ought not to be continued, because of the great danger of its ending in some act of hostility against some vessel of the Southern Confederacy, and, consequently, in a breach of neutrality.

Upon the third question therein, namely, "whether notice of the presence of vessels carrying the flag of the Southern Confederation, and suspected of being engaged in Slave Trade on the West Coast of Africa, may be conveyed to the cruizers of the United States, without incurring the charge of conveying information to an enemy, and of so violating the absolute neutrality ordered to be observed by the officers of Her Majesty's navy,"—we are of opinion that such notice of the presence of suspected vessels carrying the flag of the Southern Confederation ought not to be conveyed to the cruizers of the United States, as the conveying such notice would be inconsistent with the duties of neutrality.

Injunction of Court of Chancery upon Lieutenant-Colonel Wyatt's pension from Spanish Government.

WE were favoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 7th instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Wyatt, late of the British Auxiliary Legion, stating the circumstances under which he is prevented, by an injunction of the Court of Chancery, from receiving his pension from the Spanish Government, and requesting your Lordship's interference in his favour with the Spanish Minister at this Court; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion upon this question; and as to the answer which should be returned to Lieutenant-Colonel Wyatt.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have carefully considered the above-mentioned letter, and have the honour to report—

That we recommend your Lordship not to interfere in this matter.

In our opinion, Lieutenant-Colonel Wyatt acted very unadvisedly (if he had a good defence against his mortgagee), in assuming that the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction, and, therefore, not appearing in the suit instituted against him.

The Spanish Minister and Agent have acted very properly in respecting the injunction of the Court.

MOSQUITO.

British claims on lands within Mosquito reserve.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th of May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith, with reference to the observations contained in my Report of the 1st of May, amended drafts of instructions to Mr. Green, and of notice to be inserted in the "Gazette," respecting British claims on land situate within the Mosquito reserve; and to request that I would take the same into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion at my earliest convenience.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these drafts into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have perused and settled the two amended drafts (one, a draft "Gazette" notice, and the other, a draft despatch to Consul Green). From want, however, of sufficient acquaintance with the peculiar facts of the case, and with local and legal details, I am not able to settle them with perfect confidence.

1. I am not fully aware whether the whole of the Mosquito Reserve (as to lands in which district exclusively these claims are confined) is within the territory of the Republic of Nicaragua, or whether any of it is in Honduras (see Treaty with Honduras, 1859, Article II). If any of the Reserve, as to which claims are apprehended, is in Honduras, the draft notification and despatch must be amended accordingly.

2. With respect to the paragraph in the draft despatch as to claims in respect of emancipated slaves, I do not understand the ground or origin of such claims by Her Majesty's subjects as against the Mosquito Indians, or how they can be now recognized as valid; more especially, seeing the remarks of Consul Green at folios 11 and 12 of No. 6, February 1, 1861, as to slavery never having been acknowledged in the Mosquito territory or in Nicaragua, and bearing in mind the English law on the subject. I have therefore struck through the passage in the draft despatch on this subject; and I have not introduced any words appropriate to claims in regard of slaves into the draft "Gazette" notification. I invite particular attention to this question, which must be fully considered before the matter proceeds.

3. I am not aware what other claims, excepting land-claims (and possibly slave-claims) exist, against the Mosquito Indians, or are to be now dealt with.

4. I beg respectfully again to suggest the expediency of delaying this matter, either until the result of the claims against Honduras and Nicaragua is ascertained, or until a complete understanding is arrived at with Nicaragua as to these Mosquito Reserve claims, for the reasons indicated in my former Report of May 1, or at least until Consul Green can be further communicated with, more especially as regards the slave-claims.

If, however, it is to proceed, the Consul should be hereafter instructed to notify a particular date after which no claim will be received, which notification should also be inserted in the "London Gazette."

My Lord,

FRANCE.

Extradition from British Guiana of French criminals escaping from Cayenne.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 16th April ultimo, in which he stated that with reference to our Report of the 31st of July last, transmitting the draft of an Ordinance to be issued by the Legislature of British Guiana for the extradition of French criminals convicted of certain crimes, who might escape from Cayenne into British Guiana, he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a printed copy of the Ordinance as it had been passed in the Colony.

Mr. Hammond was pleased to say, that on a full consideration of the evils likely to result to the Colony if it became a place of refuge for men of desperate character escaping from Cayenne, Her Majesty's Government thought it desirable to extend the operation of the proposed measure to some other offences of the gravest character, in addition to those specified in the Convention with France of 1843.

That in other respects the Ordinance was nearly in the terms of our draft, and the reasons for such variations as had been made therefrom were stated in the Report of the Attorney-General of British Guiana, inclosed in the letter from the Colonial Office which was transmitted to us.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to say, that he inclosed for our further information the correspondence which had taken place on the subject since the matter was last before us, and to request that we would report to your Lordship our opinion "whether there is any objection to the Ordinance, as passed, being submitted for Her Majesty's confirmation."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have perused the Ordinance and correspondence submitted to us, and have the honour to report—

That in accordance with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 12th June, 1860, we confined the terms of the Draft Ordinance, as then prepared by us, to the crimes specified in the Treaty with France of 1843, namely, murder, attempt to commit murder, forgery, and fraudulent bankruptcy. Lord Wodehouse stated in effect that both the arrangement and the Ordinance were to be thus limited, and that "arrangements of an analogous kind had been made at different times between certain of Her Majesty's Colonies in the West Indies and the adjacent Republics for the mutual surrender of criminals."

We observe that the Ordinance, as settled by us, has been altered in the the Colony, inter alia, by the addition of the crimes of "arson, rape, burglary, house-breaking, and robbery (comprehending the crimes known in the French Penal Code, as "vol avec violence ou effraction").

Thus it will be seen that the above crimes are, although not included in those enumerated in the Convention of 1843, and not the subjects of extradition of persons accused as between France and England, are to be so treated by the Ordinance as between British and French Guiana with reference to persons convicted.

This will not, in our opinion, affect the legal validity of the Ordinance should it be confirmed by Her Majesty, but as a matter of general principle, and as a precedent, it may be productive hereafter of some inconvenience.

It is also possible that under Section 7 of the Ordinance, some difficulty may be experienced in obtaining complete reciprocity as to these crimes on the part of French Guiana.

We observe that the questionable propriety of extradition for mere "theft" has already attracted your Lordship's attention. To the other alterations made by the Colony in our Draft Ordinance we see no serious objection; and under these circumstances we must leave the question of the propriety of the confirmation of the Ordinance as it stands (which is rather a question of policy than a legal question), to the final decision of Her Majesty's Government.

Trial of Mr. Moss in the Consular Court.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us drafts of despatches and letters (5) respecting the case of Mr. Moss in Japan, which have been prepared in consequence of the observations contained in our Report of the 26th ultimo, and requested that we would take the same into our consideration, and acquaint your Lordship whether they are right and proper to be sent, and correctly represent our views as stated in our Report.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That we have read and considered the two draft despatches.

In the letter to Mr. Moss's father (No. 2), we do not think it necessary to suggest any alteration.

In the letter to Mr. Alcock (No. 1), we take the liberty of suggesting that in page 2, the words "to warrant a conviction on each of them" be struck out, and in lieu thereof, these words, "to prove the allegations," be inserted.

In page 6 strike out the word "faulty," and insert "illegal." We have made these alterations in the copy before us.

In the despatch to Mr. Alcock Nos. 3 and 4, and the letter to the Colonial Secretary No. 5, we do not find it necessary to suggest any alteration.

Proposed Draft to Admiralty, as submitted to the Queen's Advocate.

Sir, Foreign Office, May , 1861.

I HAVE laid before Lord J. Russell your letter of the 27th instant, inclosing a copy of a letter from Rear-Admiral Milne, dated the 1st instant, in which he requests instructions with regard to questions arising out of the impending hostilities between the Northern and Southern States of North America.

I am to request that you will state to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that Lord J. Russell is of opinion that Rear-Admiral Milne should be informed in answer to the first question, that the Northern and Southern States are to be considered as in a state of actual war.

With regard to the second question, namely, as to how far British vessels and goods will be affected by the Paris Declaration of 1856 in regard to free ships making free goods, if not contraband of war, and neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, not being liable to capture under an enemy's flag, his Lordship requests that the Rear-Admiral should be instructed that that Declaration will not be applicable to British vessels and goods until the terms of it have been assented to by the belligerents.

Rear-Admiral Milne's third question is, whether the belligerents are to be allowed to visit and search British merchant-vessels upon the high seas. Lord J. Russell conceives that the Admiral should be told in reply that the British Courts recognize the right of visit and search as a right appertaining to belligerents.

With regard to contraband of war, which forms the fourth question, it must rest with the belligerents to define what articles will be so considered.

And, lastly, with respect to blockades, Lord J. Russell requests that Rear-Admiral Milne may be informed that there cannot be a doubt that the validity of a blockade depends upon its efficiency.

I am to add that this letter has been submitted to, and has received the concurrence of, the proper Law Advisers of the Crown.

I am, &c.

Draft to Admiralty, as approved by the Queen's Advocate.

Sir, Foreign Office, May , 1861.

I HAVE laid before Lord J. Russell your letter of the 27th instant, inclosing a copy of letter from Rear-Admiral Milne, dated the 1st instant, in which he requests instructions with regard to certain questions stated by him as arising out of the impending hostilities between the Northern and Southern States of North America.

State of war.

I am to request that you will state to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that Lord J. Russell is of opinion that Rear-Admiral Milne should be informed in answer to the first question,* that the Northern, or "United" States, and Southern, or "Confederate" States, are to be considered as in a state of actual war with each other.

Declaration of Paris. Free ships; free goods.

With regard to the second question, namely, as to how far British vessels and goods will be affected by the Paris Declaration of 1856 in regard to free ships making free goods, if not contraband of war, and neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, not being liable to capture under an enemy's flag, his Lordship requests that the Rear-Admiral should be instructed that neither the Northern nor the Southern States having as yet acceded to the Declaration of Paris, the rules laid down in that Declaration will not be applicable to British vessels and goods, as the vessels and goods of neutrals, during the war between the Northern and Southern States, until further notice and fresh instructions to you.

Right of search.

Rear-Admiral Milne's third question is, whether the belligerents are to be allowed to visit and search British merchant-vessels upon the high seas. Lord J. Russell conceives that the Admiral should be told in reply, that the right of visit and search is regarded by Her Majesty's Government as a right appertaining to the lawfully commissioned cruizers of belligerents when exercised by them subject to and in conformity with the modern law and usage of nations.

Contraband of war.

With regard to contraband of war, which forms the fourth question, the Admiral should be instructed that, excepting as to arms, ammunition, and military stores (which are clearly "contraband of war" by the common law and usage of nations), it must be left to the Governments and Prize Courts of the belligerents, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, in accordance with the law and usage of nations, to define and announce what articles will be so considered and treated by them.

Blockade.

And, lastly, with respect to Rear-Admiral Milne's fifth question, which is as follows, "the validity of a blockade held to be dependent upon its efficiency," Lord J. Russell is of opinion that the answer to this question, as he understands it, is decidedly in the affirmative.

I am to add that this letter has been submitted to, and has received the concurrence of, the proper Law Advisers of the Crown.

I am, &c.

PERU.

Claim of Mr. Carwell to administer ~~to administer~~ to property of late Mr. M. Winder, in Peru.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th day of April last, in which he stated that he was directed by you to transmit to us a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Lima (No. 12), together with a letter from Messrs. Dawes and Son, dated April 27, respecting the difficulties with which Mr. Carwell had been met in Peru in his endeavours to administer to the property of his father-in-law, the late Mr. Michael Winder; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that we would take the papers into our consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion as to the instructions which should be sent to Mr. Jerningham upon the subject.

And Lord Wodehouse also inclosed a further despatch from Mr. Jerningham (No. 13), stating that Mr. Carwell wished to send home a box containing personal property belonging to Mr. Winder, and placed by Mr. Carwell under the protection of the British Legation, and requested that we would advise your Lordship what instructions should be sent to Mr. Jerningham with regard to the disposal of this box.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have perused the despatches and inclosures submitted to us, and have the honour to report—

That it is stated by Messrs. Dawes and Sons, in their letter of April 27, 1861, that England was the place of the domicil of the late Mr. Winder at the time of his death; and this is assumed by Mr. Carwell throughout his correspondence with Mr. Jerningham, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Lima. If such be the case, the personal property of Mr. Winder being at Lima ought to be administered by Mr. Carwell under the English probate. But it is to be collected that this is the matter in dispute, Mr. Winder's widow setting up a Peruvian, and therefore denying the English, domicil, and appealing to the Peruvian Courts to interfere in her behalf, and decree distribution according to Peruvian law. If such be the case, then, so long as the ordinary course in like cases is pursued, and the law itself is not contrary to the common principles of natural justice (which we have no reason to suppose), we are of opinion that Her Majesty's Government could not, with any propriety, interfere. The question is one clearly within the jurisdiction of the Peruvian Courts; and Mr. Carwell is in error in supposing that he is exempt, by reason of his being a British subject, from such jurisdiction, so long as he remains in Peru, and with reference to property there found and being.

It is also a mistake to suppose that property, part of the late Mr. Winder's estate, is withdrawn from Peruvian jurisdiction, by being deposited (as it is expressed) "under the British flag." Under the circumstances, and especially seeing that Mr. Pike has already received a notification from the Peruvian Courts respecting the property (the box and contents) thus deposited, it appears to us that Mr. Jerningham should be instructed to adhere to the determination already expressed by him, and described in his despatch of March 28, 1861 (No. 13), that is, not to part with possession of the box without the joint authority of Mr. Pike and Mr. Carwell, and the return to him of the receipt which he gave on the box being delivered to him.

Should Mr. Jerningham receive any notification from the Peruvian Courts, he will do well to respect it.

The personal restraint under which Mr. Carwell has been placed appears to be a means of compelling him to give security or bail; and here again no just ground of international complaint arises, provided the ordinary law of the country has been applied. Mr. Carwell is personally within the Peruvian jurisdiction by his own act: the subject matter, being property in Peru, is also subject thereto; and before the Peruvian tribunals he must be left to fight out his legal battle with the widow, with such local professional assistance as he may think proper, but without the official intervention of Her Majesty's Government.

Fine imposed on the "Prince Albert" for throwing ashes overboard in Lisbon Harbour.

Doctors' Commons, May 30, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th May instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a correspondence respecting a case which has arisen out of a fine imposed in October last on the master of the British vessel "Prince Albert," for throwing ashes overboard in Lisbon Harbour, in contravention of the Regulations of that port, and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether there are sufficient grounds for any further interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd May instant, transmitting a further despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon respecting this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That considering all the circumstances of this case, and especially those appearing in the papers transmitted to me with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 23rd May, I am of opinion that there are no sufficient grounds for any further interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Exclusion of ships of war and privateers of United States and Confederate States with prizes from ports of United Kingdom and Colonial or other possessions abroad.

Doctors' Commons, June 1, 1861.

My Lord,

WE are favoured with Mr. Hammond's note of May 30, stating that Her Majesty's Government propose that all ships of war and privateers of the United States, and of the so-styled Confederate States of North America, shall be excluded from taking prizes into the ports belonging to Her Majesty, whether in the United Kingdom or in Her Majesty's Colonial or other possessions abroad.

Mr. Hammond requests that we will have the goodness to consider and report to your Lordship, with as little delay as possible, our opinion whether Her Majesty's Government will be justified by the law of nations in so doing; and whether the draft of letter, herewith sent, may properly be addressed to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and to Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for the Colonial, War, and Indian Offices.

We have the honour to report—

That it is perfectly consistent with the law of nations for a neutral Power to interdict the privateers of a belligerent from entering its ports under any circumstances.

It is competent to a neutral to interdict the regularly-commissioned ships of a belligerent from entering its ports, except under circumstances of urgent necessity.

These rights and principles have been repeatedly acted on by European nations, especially during the late war with Russia, and they have been adopted to their full extent by the United States of America.

We would refer to the following authorities: Hopner v. Appleby, 5 Mason's Reports, 77; Act of Congress, March 3, 1805; French Ordinance of 1861 (see Pistoye et Duverdy, 449).

There cannot be any doubt, therefore, of the interdict contained in your Lordship's proposed letter being fully warranted by the law and practice of nations.

It may be a question whether the principles embodied in the Declaration of Paris might not require that the use of our ports should be interdicted to privateers under any circumstances.

We beg leave to suggest that the alterations we have made in your Lordship's letter be adopted, subject to which we approve of the letter.

We have, &c.

United States' blockade of the port of Charleston and adjacent coast.

Doctors' Commons, June 4, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 3rd June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch, and its inclosures, from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 205) respecting the blockade which had been instituted by the United States' frigate "Niagara," of the port of Charleston and the adjacent coast; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, my opinion upon the various questions therein raised in relation to this blockade.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I see no ground for the official interference of Lord Lyons in this matter with the Government of the United States, and his instructions to Consul Bunch appear to me to have been proper, under the circumstances.

It is impossible to determine, merely upon these papers, whether the blockade of Charleston (which was effective from the 11th to the 15th May inclusive) had altogether ceased, or had only been temporarily or imperfectly maintained, from the 15th to the 20th May, which is apparently the date of the last communication, by telegraph, from the Consul.

However this may be, I concur with Lord Lyons as to the inexpediency of his making any formal communication to the United States' Government, either for an extension of time to British vessels to leave Charleston, or on any other point, founded on the supposed invalidity or imperfection of the blockade.

With respect to the Consul's private letter to Lord Lyons of the 17th May, as to what he calls "the conversion" of American into English vessels (I presume, by sale, and the granting of a Consular "provisional certificate of registry" thereupon), the communication is so short that it is not easy to deal with it. It does not follow that vessels so purchased "must be protected," at all hazards, from capture; to which, on the contrary, they may, in my opinion, be liable.

With respect to the Consul's allusion to "fraud on the United States," I can only say that, whilst he should not give any facilities to fraud, there is no reason why he should absolutely refuse to issue such certificates when satisfied that a bonâ fide purchase, for adequate value, and without any secret or colourable arrangement, has actually taken place. But he should not encourage such dealings, and he should warn all the parties concerned that they effect such sales and purchases at their own risk, and subject to all legal and international questions relative thereto.

The legal effect and operation of the purchase of enemies' ships by neutrals, flagrante bello, is a question for the decision of the Government or the Prize Court of the captor. The prize law and practice of nations on this point is not uniform: France, for instance, absolutely refuses to recognize the validity of such "conversions" after war has commenced, whilst England recognizes them under certain circumstances, as when satisfied of their bona fides, that the value was paid, and the entire interest transferred; that there was no secret agreement between the parties, in fraudem juris gentium; see, for instance, the "Ariel" (Sorensen v. the Queen), 11 Moore's Privy Council Reports, page 119; the "Maria" (Batten v. the Queen), ibid., page 271.

I am unable to say whether the United States' Government or Prize Courts have as yet determined this question, as to which the Consul and British purchasers should inform themselves. The Consul and Lord Lyons should transmit full information on this point from the best possible quarters.

It is impossible to send the Consul instructions merely upon this private letter, and without further information, especially as to the view taken by the United States' Government and by its Prize Courts on the subject.

As regards the want of a formal and official public notification of blockade, I can only say that it does not appear to me to be for the interest of Her Majesty's Government, as a neutral Power, to complain at present, inasmuch as the United States' practice (which has been formally announced) of giving notice to each individual ship is more favourable to neutrals than that of Great Britain, which considers all parties as "affected with notice" who have (howsoever) received actual knowledge from any credible source of the official notification, and which even infers such notice after the lapse of a sufficient time.

Slave Trade carried on from the East Coast of Africa.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th May ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying letter from the India Office, dated 24th April, 1861, with its inclosures, from the Government of Bombay, and from Colonel Rigby, Her Majesty's Agent and Consul at Zanzibar, relative to the Slave Trade which is carried on from the East Coast of Africa.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that I should perceive by a despatch dated the 26th November last (No. 79), from Colonel Rigby to the Secretary to the Government of Bombay (which forms one of the inclosures in the India Office letter), that on the occasion of the capture by the authorities of the Sultan of Zanzibar, in His Highness' port of Lamoo, of a slave-vessel without papers, the master of which vessel acknowledged that he had come for slaves, the French Consul endeavoured to persuade the Sultan that he had no power, under any circumstances, to capture a slave-vessel, unless he had a Treaty empowering him to do so with the nation to which the slaver might belong; and that the Sultan, being ignorant of the law of nations, has requested the opinion of Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion upon the point raised by the French Consul; and as to the instructions which it would be proper to give to Colonel Rigby in this matter.

Lord Wodehouse also stated that he transmitted a further despatch from Colonel Rigby (No. 5A, 14th January, 1861), reporting that the Sultan has handed over the captured slave-vessel to the Commander of Her Majesty's ship

"Persian;" and requested that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether there is any legal objection to this proceeding.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Seizure of the "Formosa Estrella."

That the first question to be considered is: "Was the Sultan's seizure of the 'Formosa Estrella' in a port of Zanzibar justifiable; and on what ground, according to the law of Zanzibar, by reason of some act done by the master or crew in the territory or waters of Zanzibar?"

The onus is legally on the Sultan to justify his seizure of this (apparently) Spanish ship in one of his ports. If this question can be answered affirmatively, the mere absence of any Treaty between Spain and Zanzibar will have no effect upon the legality of the seizure. But without explicit information as to the law of Zanzibar on this point, it is impossible for me to deal properly with the case.

I may, however, point out—

1st. That the master is not stated to have protested or objected.

2ndly. That although it appears that the ship was under the Spanish flag when seized, yet she had no Spanish "ship's papers," and apparently no regular set of "ship's papers," and she had recently shown both French and Mexican colours.

3rdly. That she was equipped as a slaver; and that the master admitted that he had come there to procure slaves.

4thly. That it is not stated whether there is any Spanish Consular authority in Zanzibar; or whether the Spanish subjects there are under French or any other Consular protection, provisionally or permanently, by international arrangement, or de facto, and by usage; and it does not appear that the French Consul officially interfered on behalf of the ship or the master.

5thly. It may on further investigation turn out that the seizure was legally justifiable on some other ground than her slave equipment; as for defect of papers, for having no register, for having ten men not entered on her list of crew or muster-roll, and so forth.

These points should be cleared up with a view to enable Her Majesty's Government to support or advise the Sultan not only in this case, but in this class of cases hereafter, inasmuch as they seem likely to recur.

It may be suggested to Colonel Rigby, in case of the law of Zanzibar being doubtful or defective as to such cases, to point out to the Sultan the expediency of promptly enacting and publishing some simple laws and regulations, making the Slave Trade and the using or equipping of vessels for that trade within his territory a punishable offence; and expressly authorizing and enjoining the seizure and forfeiture of all slave-vessels and cargoes, and the liberation of all slaves found howsoever, or brought by whomsoever, within his territorial jurisdiction.

It would also be desirable to know whether the equipping or using a slave-ship, or the doing of any and what overt act in furtherance of an admitted general design to carry on the Slave Trade, either within Spanish jurisdiction or generally and beyond it (whether, in short, the conduct of the master of the "Formosa Estrella" in this case), is or is not an offence against the law of Spain, as it would be against that of England; this information can be obtained through Her Majesty's Legation at Madrid.

I must also desire to be referred to the Treaty or Treaties now in force between the Sultan of Zanzibar and Her Majesty, and also between him and any other Power, for the suppression of the Slave Trade.

With respect to the last question in Lord Wodehouse's letter, I can only say that I am unable to find in the three despatches from Colonel Rigby (Nos. 44, 78, and 79 of 1860) transmitted with these papers, any mention of the captured slave-vessel having been handed over by the Sultan to the Commander of Her Majesty's ship "Persian." If, therefore, my opinion is desired upon this point (which, however, cannot well be determined until the legality of the original seizure is ascertained), I must request further information, with which the Admiralty has doubtless been furnished by that officer.

Messrs. Scott's claim. Goods imported into Naples from Malta under the French flag.

Doctors' Commons, June 4, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th May ultimo, stating that with reference to my Report of the 20th December last, upon the subject of Messrs. Scott's claim, under the Treaty of 1845, for a reduction of 10 per cent. on some British goods imported by them into Naples from Malta, under the French flag, he was directed to transmit to me a further despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Naples, together with the former papers upon this subject, and to request that I would take the same into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the nature of any instruction which should be addressed to Mr. Consul Bonham in reply to his last despatch.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the information forthcoming on this matter is still very scanty; and it does not appear whether any, and what, other nations have similar Treaties with the late Government of the Two Sicilies, or how these are interpreted and applied to the point in question.

As at present advised, I can only say that the case of the Sardinian Government, as stated in the letter of the Director-General of the Indirect Customs to the Consul, dated April 3, 1861, is not satisfactory.

I cannot discover from a perusal of the Treaties between Her Majesty and the King of the Two Sicilies of April 29, 1845, and of September 26, 1816 (referred to therein), any sufficient ground upon which it can be maintained that the words "merchandize and productions of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, her Colonies, Possessions, and Dependencies, imported by them into His Majesty's dominions," in Article XIV of the Treaty of 1845, are either in express terms or by necessary implication limited or restrained by reference to Article VII; or that in order to entitle such merchandize or productions so imported to the reduction of 10 per cent. stipulated in Article XIV, importation thereof must have taken place in a British ship.

The VIIth Article seems to me to have been stipulated alio intuitu; the words therein "which can legally be imported into either country from the other in ships of the other," were probably introduced for a peculiar object connected with that Article, and do not extend to the general stipulation contained in Article XIV, which Article, moreover, contains no reference to Article VII, nor can I discover anything in the Convention of 1816 to favour such a contention.

It is observable that Article XIV refers to the VIth preceding Article (and not to the VIIth). The VIth Article is favourable to the British claim; it is in the most general terms, and in the nature of a reciprocal and most-favoured nation Article; "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." It would have been natural to have found a reference in this XIVth Article to the VIIth as well as to the VIth preceding Article, if the Director's arguments are well founded.

At all events the importance of this question deserves a more formal discussion than it has as yet received on the part of the Sicilian (or Sardinian) authorities; and it will be for your Lordship, after ascertaining how the point stands with other nations, either to instruct the Consul to raise it, or to raise it directly with the Sardinian Government, as may be thought advisable.

Blockade of port of Charleston. Claim of Messrs. Byrne and Co. Proceedings against the "Monmouth" and "Hilja."

Doctors' Commons, June 6, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 4th of June instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 4th of June instant,* respecting the blockade of the port of Charleston, he was directed to transmit to me copies of a letter and its inclosures from Messrs. Byrne and Co., of Liverpool, dated June 3, 1861, preferring a claim against the United States' Government on account of the proceedings of the United States' frigate "Niagara" towards the British ship "Monmouth," of which Messrs. Byrne and Co. are part owners; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon at my earliest convenience.

I am also honoured with two further letters from Mr. Hammond, dated the 5th of June instant, transmitting further papers relating to this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1st. That as regards the British vessel "Monmouth," she appears to have sailed from Liverpool on the 24th of March, with orders to proceed to Savannah, if Charleston was blockaded. She arrived off Charleston on the 12th of May, and was boarded by an officer from the United States' frigate "Niagara," who endorsed her papers, "Boarded May 12, and ordered off the whole Southern Coast of the United States of America, it being blockaded." She thereupon proceeded to British North America. Her owners claim compensation. It is suggested that neither Savannah nor the whole South Coast was then blockaded; but until this fact is ascertained beyond all doubt, more especially as to Savannah, it is obvious that Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere. It should also be ascertained whether any and what conversation took place between the master and the boarding officer as to the blockade of Savannah (to which port she had an alternative destination), and whether the intention to proceed thither was stated to the boarding officer, and what thereupon ensued. The grievance in this case would seem to be confined to the notice deterring her from going to Savannah. Charleston was effectually blockaded on the 12th of May, and she was rightfully warned off that port. It is obvious that this case is not quite ripe for decision. The facts as to the blockade of Savannah on the 12th of March must be explained.

2ndly. The British vessel "Hilja," which also sailed from Liverpool on the 24th of March, was also boarded off Charleston by an officer from the "Niagara" on the 12th of May, and her papers were endorsed in a similar manner to those of the "Monmouth," and she likewise proceeded to a British North American port, and her owners claim compensation. It is not alleged that the "Hilja" had any alternative destination, or any design to proceed to any other Southern port in the event of Charleston being blockaded, or on discovering that it was, in fact, blockaded. I do not, therefore, at present see how her owners' claim for compensation can be sustained. The notice as to the blockade of all the Southern ports (even if untrue and improper) was, as regards the "Hilja" (for all that appears), damnum absque injuria.

3rdly. With reference to the interruption of the blockade of Charleston after May 15, by the temporary absence of the "Niagara," in pursuit, as would seem, of a particular vessel laden with arms from Belgium (the "Niagara" being, I presume, the only blockading vessel), the circumstances of her absence require explanation.

4thly. I consider it my duty to state, with great deference, that I do not, as at present advised, perceive the practical advantage which is to be expected from Her Majesty's Minister officially calling the attention of the United States' Government either to this particular circumstance, or to every interruption or imperfection of an established blockade which may occur, and making demands in connection therewith, on the United States' Government. Such communications seem to me rather calculated to stimulate the vigilance and rigour of the Government, and to excite some irritation in the highly sensitive temperament of the United States' authorities, without any sufficient adequate or direct advantage. A blockade must be regularly and effectively maintained, in order to be legal against neutrals; and if British vessels should be captured for breaking an illegal or partial and fluctuating blockade, or warned off ports not blockaded, this may form a just ground of complaint; but I would venture to suggest that such complaints should be founded on a clear "constat" of facts, and on some actual case of wrong sustained, and that, especially at the very commencement of a civil war, it may not be expedient for Her Majesty's Government to enter, without urgent necessity, into discussions with that of the United States on this blockade, unless in some urgent case, or where there is some good reason to suppose that the Government of the United States will concede that which is sought.

---

* Page 103.

1861

I would also express my entire concurrence with Lord Lyons as to the great expediency of his endeavouring to secure the co-operation of other foreign Legations in any general representations to the United States' Government on the subject of the blockade.

The Queen's Advocate to Lord J. Russell.—(Received June 7.)

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 7, 1861.

UNITED STATES, AND GENERAL.

Interdiction of British ports to privateers and their prizes.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me therewith notice of a question to be asked your Lordship in the House of Commons, respecting the practice which has been heretofore observed in regard to the interdiction of British ports to privateers and their prizes; and to request that I would furnish your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, with any information on the matter which may enable your Lordship to answer this question.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That if the question relates to the former practice of Great Britain exclusively, I have only to observe that I am unable at this moment to refer to any instance in which this country has actually put in force her right of excluding from her ports prizes captured by the contending parties in a war in which she was neutral.

It is to be observed that as regards international wars, Great Britain has rarely, in modern times, been neutral during a naval war carried on between maritime Powers on any extensive scale. As regards civil wars or revolts, she has frequently been neutral: but in most of such cases, as (for instance), Spain and South America, 1817-19 and 1823-26; Turkey and Greece, 1825-26; Prussia and Denmark, 1848-49; and in several cases the South American Republics, inter se; the naval resources of the parties have been limited, or the contest has been carried on in such localities, or under such circumstances, as did not threaten to involve this country in any serious practical difficulties with either belligerent, and did not call for any stringent measures on her part in order to preserve intact the complete neutrality of her ports and waters, and to maintain her undoubted power of excluding therefrom the cruizers and the prizes of all belligerents. Possibly further search may elicit something in point as to some of these peculiar instances.

In the present case, however, I need only allude to the geographical and political position of all parties; to the scale on which naval hostilities between the belligerents are likely to be conducted; to the announcement of a blockade extending from the Capes of Virginia, latitude 36° north, to the mouth of the Rio Grande del Norte, latitude 26° north; and to the immediate proximity to the theatre of war of such British Possessions (for instance) as the Bahamas (as to which the position of the Florida coast and Florida channel or stream, and the American forts at Key West and the Tortugas, are remarkable) and the Bermudas, to show the very peculiar features of the present case.

Great Britain, moreover, when herself engaged in the contest with her revolted subjects, which is known as the "war of American independence," called upon neutral nations to act in the manner in which she is now herself acting: see her communications with Holland, as to the exclusion of American vessels, and especially as to Paul Jones, his prizes and prisoners (Martens, "Nouvelles Causes Célèbres," vol. i, pp. 116, 118, et seq., 152, 156); who was apparently forbidden to receive "ni secours, ni asile," and compelled to leave Holland.

Lastly (although the case is not precisely in point), I would beg leave to remind your Lordship that Great Britain, although neutral between Turkey and Greece in 1827, finding the excesses of the Greek private armed vessels unbearable, issued orders to seize, even on the high seas, "every armed vessel met with under the Greek flag," excepting the ships of war of the Greek Government. (See the Order in Council, November 16, 1827, Hertslet's "State Papers," vol. iv, p. 784.)

The exercise of the right in question, under various modifications, has been so frequently and notoriously the subject of Treaty stipulations between various nations, more particularly the United States of North America, that I abstain, from want of time, from elaborate references. I may, however, mention the Treaty between Great Britain and the United States, November 19, 1794, Articles XXIV and XXV, and that of December 31, 1806, Articles XVII, XVIII, and XIX, which contain peculiar stipulations on the point in question. (See Hauterive et De Cussy, "Recueil des Traités," vol. vi, pp. 208, 229.)

With respect to the general question of the right of a neutral Power to exclude belligerent ships of war, privateers, and prizes from its ports and waters, there can be no doubt.

As regards the United States of America, I would refer to the Act of Congress, Session 2, chapter 41 (approved March 3, 1805), sections 4 and 5, empowering the President "to permit or interdict at pleasure the entrance of the harbours and waters under the jurisdiction of the United States to all armed vessels belonging to any foreign nation, and by force to repel and move them from the same, excepting in cases of distress, danger of the sea, or pursuit by an enemy, or when charged with despatches or business from the Government to which they belong;" and further authorizing "the employment of force to compel their departure, in case of their failing to depart after being required so to do:" to the judgment of Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Hopner v. Appleby, reported in 5 Mason's "Reports of the Circuit Court of the United States," p. 77, who says: "In general, neutral nations allow them (captors) an asylum in their ports. They may, indeed, prohibit their entry into their ports, or the sale of their prizes there, from motives of policy or public convenience; . . . . it is one of those points which every neutral nation arranges according to its own sound discretion and policy—it is free to refuse or grant it."

Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," part 4, cap. 3, sec. 14, p. 498, edition of 1857; Kent's "Commentaries," vol. i, p. 124.

As regards France, see the Ordinance of 1681, Articles 9 and 14, and comments thereon of Pistoye et Duverdy, "Traité des Prises Maritimes," p. 449 (a book of recent and very high authority); Hautefeuille, "Droits et Devoirs des Nations Neutres," vol. i, p. 480; Ortolan, "Régles Internationales et Diplomatie de la Mer," vol. ii, p. 266.

This right is, moreover, in viridi observantiâ, and was exercised with various modifications by many of the neutral Powers of Europe in 1854, on the occasion of the last war between Great Britain and her allies with Russia: amongst others by Sweden, Declaration, April 8, 1854, Article 9; Spain, Decree, April 12, 1854, Article 1; Hamburgh, Ordinance, April 26, 1854; Lübeck, same date, Article 3; Belgium, April 25, 1854; Mecklenburg, Ordinance; Hanover, Law of May 5, 1854, Article 2; Two Sicilies, May 17, 1854; Austria, Decree, May 23, 1854, Article 7; Tuscany, Ordinance, June 3, 1854, Article 2. Memorandum on the Treatment of Privateers during the War between Mexico and the United States.

DURING the war between Mexico and the United States an American barque, the "Carmelita," was captured by a Mexican privateer off the coast of Spain about the month of April 1847.

1861

About the same time the Spanish Consul at Gibraltar reported that a Mexican privateer, the "Rosita," had left the port of Oran to cruize in the Mediterranean against American commerce.

Mr. Bancroft, May 14, 1847.

Upon receipt of this intelligence the American Minister in London (Mr. Bancroft) reported the facts to the Foreign Office, and expressed a hope that Lord Palmerston, who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, "would take such measures as would prevent Gibraltar or any other British port in the Mediterranean becoming a place of refuge for these depredators on British property (which he pointed out was on board such American vessels) as well as on American commerce."

To Mr. Hay, No. 4, June 5, 1847.

Information having been received by the British Government that the facts reported with respect to the privateer "Rosita" were correct, and that she was sailing under Spanish colours, and intended to carry her prizes for sale into the ports of Morocco, Mr. Drummond Hay, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Morocco, was (on the report of the Queen's Advocate) furnished with the following instructions.

In the first place he was informed that in the opinion of some eminent writers upon the law of nations the Government of a neutral State had a right to admit into its ports belligerent cruizers with their prizes, and to permit such prizes to be sold therein; but that there seemed to be no reason to doubt that a neutral State might, if it thought proper, withhold the exercise of that privilege, although, if it did so, it should refuse it equally to both belligerents.

He was then told that in a case which occurred during the last war, Lord Stowell, speaking of prizes being carried into a neutral port and there sold, had said:—

"The neutral State had nothing to do with the rights of force possessed by the one belligerent against the other; that it had nothing to do with the enforcement or consummation of such rights; that it owed to both parties the simple rights of hospitality, and that even these were very limited in the practice of most civilized States; that by the regulations of France foreign vessels were forbidden to enter with prizes into a port of France, except in cases of distress, and then they were permitted to stay no longer than their necessity existed;" and it was added that in this opinion other foreign jurists coincided.

Mr. Drummond Hay was then instructed, in the event of an opportunity offering, to advise the Emperor of Morocco to follow the rule stated in Lord Stowell's judgment to be that of France, because that rule seemed most consistent with perfect neutrality, and pointing out that it would be unwise for the Emperor to draw upon himself unnecessarily the ill-will of the United States; but he was desired to be careful to confine himself to merely stating what the rule was, and not to recommend it to the Emperor for adoption, on the ground that in so doing he would be following the example of France.

Mr. Bancroft, May 29, 1847.

Ultimately the Spanish Government, having been appealed to, caused the captain and crew of the pretended Mexican privateer "Unico," alias "Rosita," to be taken out of their vessel by a party of soldiers, and lodged in the town prison of Barcelona to await their trial as pirates under Article XIV of the Treaty of 1795 between Spain and the United States, the Mexican flag was hauled down, and the vessel placed in charge of a Spanish war steamer.

England was neutral in this war between Mexico and the United States.

Extract from Wheaton's "International Law," Part IV, cap. 3, s. 14.

AN opinion is expressed by some text-writers that belligerent cruizers not only are entitled to seek an asylum and hospitality in neutral ports, but have a right to bring in and sell their prizes within those ports. But there seems to be nothing in the established principles of public law which can prevent the neutral State from withholding the exercise of this privilege impartially from all the belligerent Powers, or even from granting it to one of them, and refusing it to others, where stipulated by Treaties existing previous to the war. The usage of nations, as testified in their Marine Ordinances, sufficiently shows that this is a rightful exercise of the sovereign authority which every State possesses, to regulate the police of its own sea-ports, and to preserve the public peace within its own territory. But the absence of a positive prohibition implies a permission to enter the neutral ports for these purposes.

Mr. Moss's imprisonment. Propriety of laying papers before Parliament.

WE have had the honour of receiving your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to refer us to that part of Mr. Moss's letter of the 20th ultimo, in which he states that it is his son's intention to commence an action for damages on account of his imprisonment by order of the Consular Courts in Japan, and Mr. Hammond requested that we would report to your Lordship our opinion as to whether, under these circumstances, it would be right for Her Majesty's Government to assent to a motion in the House of Commons that the papers in this case should be laid before Parliament.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That, in our judgment and opinion, the circumstances stated by your Lordship are not a sufficient reason for refusing to produce the papers in the case, if, but for such circumstances, the Government would be willing so to do.

MOROCCO.

Spanish Consular jurisdiction in Morocco.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands, signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 29th April last, stating that, with reference to our Reports of the 27th July and 15th October, 1860, respecting the pretensions of Spain in the matter of Consular jurisdiction in Morocco, he was directed to transmit to us—

1. The draft of an instruction which your Lordship addressed, on the 11th August last, to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid, acquainting him with the view which Her Majesty's Government have taken of the question.

2. A despatch from Mr. Edwards. inclosing a copy of a note which he in consequence addressed to the Spanish Government.

3. A despatch from Sir Andrew Buchanan, inclosing the reply of the Spanish Government.

4. The draft of an instruction which your Lordship addressed to Her Majesty's Minister in Morocco on the 30th October last, subsequent to the receipt of our Report of the 15th of the same month, and which refers more especially to the correspondence therewith transmitted, marked A.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to transmit the previous correspondence on this subject, as noted in the List B, and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the answer which should be returned to the Spanish note of April 1, 1861.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the question between the two Governments has been already so fully discussed, and the Spanish Government is so resolved not to concede, and shifts its ground so frequently, that we see little use in continuing the controversy.

* See the Report from the Queen's Advocate, page 112.

Subject to this observation, we remark that the only new point now put forward by Spain in the note of Señor Collantes, April 1, 1861, is (in effect), that whatever may be the terms of the Treaty between Spain and Morocco of 1799, Article VI, the interpretation which Spain has put upon it in practice has been at variance with those terms, and such as altogether to "oust" Morocco of all jurisdiction, and to give to the Spanish Consuls the power of arbitrarily seizing, without any application or notice to the local authorities, every person of Spanish origin, accused of committing an offence on shore in Morocco, even although he might be serving on board a British vessel lying in harbour; and it is suggested that Morocco has acquiesced in this interpretation. Señor Collantes offers no other answer to our arguments on the effect of the words of that Article of that Treaty, or on the absence therefrom of any similar words in favour of Spain to those contained in favour of Great Britain in Article XIX of the Treaty of 1856.

Upon this we must observe, that the circumstance of Spain having seized Macias in breach of her Treaty with Morocco (even in the absence of any complaint from Morocco, to which jurisdiction Macias did not appeal), will not give her any claim of right as against Great Britain, or as against Macias in this case. The offence, if any, committed by Macias, was committed in Morocco, and only against the law of Morocco; and unless Spain had jurisdiction expressly conferred by Treaty, and unless she acted in accordance with the stipulations of such Treaty in exercising it, she could have had no rightful jurisdiction at all over Macias in respect of any such offence.

The Spanish Government does not explain how it happens that this question has only now arisen for the first time, or why she has hitherto permitted the exercise of British Consular jurisdiction over the numerous seamen of Spanish origin serving on board British vessels in the waters of Morocco, which is asserted by Mr. Hay, and which obviously must be the fact.

Lastly, we must point out that if Spain can do with impunity to others as she has done to Macias, in every case, other European Powers may and will do the same; and thus every British ship will be exposed to be deprived of her foreign seamen, in any part of Morocco, upon even frivolous charges or slight offences purposely committed by deserters, by means of this (hitherto novel) assertion of foreign Consular jurisdiction.

The question is of great importance to British interests; and we adhere to the opinions which we have stated in our former Reports on this case.

We have, &c.

Imprisonment of Mr. Moss. Threatened action against Mr. Alcock. Presentation of papers to Parliament.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 10, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 7th June instant,* stating that he was directed to refer the Law Officers to that portion of Mr. Moss's letter of the 20th May ultimo, now before them, in which he states that it is his son's intention to commence an action for damages on account of his imprisonment by order of the Consular Courts in Japan; and to request that they would furnish your Lordship with their opinion as to whether, under the circumstances, it would be right for Her Majesty's Government to assent to a motion in the House of Commons that the papers in this case should be laid before Parliament.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the production of the papers to Parliament in this case being, as I conceive, entirely a question for the discretion of Her Majesty's Government, and there being no urgent public interest, and no great principle of right or justice involved in the question of their being laid before Parliament; I humbly submit that, inasmuch as their publication whilst an action for damages is pending at the suit of Mr. Moss against Mr. Consul Alcock may be highly prejudicial to the Defendant, whilst it will not be attended with any advantage to Her Majesty's service, and is not absolutely required in the interests of justice or public policy, Her Majesty's Government ought not to assent to the motion.

Mr. Alcock, although acting in my opinion very ignorantly and illegally, yet acted according to the best of his judgment and without malice or improper motive, under trying circumstances; and Her Majesty's Government ought not, in my opinion, to assist the case of the Plaintiff (Mr. Moss), who is, pendente lite, a memorialist for compensation from the Crown, and more especially ought not to do so without notice to the Defendant.

I much regret to differ with my colleagues on this question.

NEW GRANADA.

Right of seceding States to levy duties on goods destined for Central States of New Granada.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 8, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 10th May ultimo, stating that with reference to my Report of the 6th May ultimo,* he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in New Granada (No. 11), reporting that some of the States which formerly formed a portion of New Granada have declared themselves temporarily independent of the Central Government, and have assumed the name of "United States of New Granada."

Validity of Decree issued by Chief of seceding States annulling contracts made by Government of Bogotá.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that a question has arisen as to the right of the de facto authorities of the Coast to levy duties upon goods destined for consumption in territories which remain under the jurisdiction of the Government of which they have declared themselves independent; and also regarding a Decree issued by General Mosquera, the Chief of the Seceding States, annulling all contracts entered into by the Government of Bogotá since the 8th May, 1860.

Liability of British merchants to pay duties twice over.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that with a view to afford me all the information on these points possessed by the Foreign Office, he was to inclose a Memorandum on the state of affairs in New Granada so far as it affects these questions; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be given to Mr. Griffith, and Her Majesty's Consuls in New Granada on these matters.

Right of de facto Government to close ports of Buenaventura, Carthagena, &c., without their being duly blockaded.

That the particular points on which my advice is requested are "as to whether any steps, and if so what steps, should be taken by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires or Her Majesty's Consuls in New Granada, by protest or otherwise, to protect British merchants from being compelled to pay Customs duties twice over; and whether British merchants are bound to pay attention to a Decree such as that communicated to Mr. Henderson by the New Granadian Intendant at Panamá, on the 1st April last, as to the closing of the port of Buenaventura, or to the communication made by the Intendant to Mr. Doyle, on the 21st March last, respecting the closing of the ports of Carthagena, Sabanilla, and Zapote, the ports in question being, as it appears, in the actual possession of a de facto government of States, which have separated from the Central Government of New Granada as hitherto constituted, and have declared themselves independent, and not being duly blockaded by a naval force.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that your Lordship gathers from my Report of the 6th May ultimo, that I had a difficulty in giving an opinion upon the question raised in Mr. Druce's despatch, from the absence of full information on what is passing in New Granada; but as the despatches now transmitted to me contain further information, your Lordship would wish to be furnished with my opinion, as far as I may be able to give it, with reference to the facts now submitted to me.

The former papers in this matter were inclosed for reference.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th May ultimo, transmitting a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Panamá (No. 16), inclosing copies of a correspondence between the Intendant-General of Panamá and himself, relative to the conveyance of passengers and cargo between the ports of Colon and Carthagena.

1861

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 31st May ultimo, transmitting a letter from Mr. Joshua Finner, dated May 27th, calling attention to a notice received by the New Granadian Consul at Liverpool from the New Granadian Minister in this country, regarding the closing of the ports at Rio Hacha, Santa Martha, Sabanilla, Carthagena, and Zapote.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That upon consideration of the complicated and somewhat doubtful state of facts indicated in these papers, as actually existing in New Granada, I am of opinion that, inasmuch as no force has been used, or is apparently about to be forthwith used, to compel British merchants to pay Customs duties twice over, there is no urgent necessity for instructing Her Majesty's Minister or Consuls to make any further protests than those which they have made, more especially as it is not easy to point out what further should be done.

With respect to the closing of the ports of Buenaventura, Carthagena, Sabanilla, and Zapote, by the mere decree of the Central Government, whilst these ports are held by a de facto Government, representing certain States seceding from the Central Government, and are not blockaded, I am of opinion that such Decree cannot be considered as sufficient to authorize the Central Government to detain or capture British vessels upon the high seas, merely for designing or attempting to proceed to those ports, as long as they remain unblockaded. If the Central Government has not been informed to this effect, this should be done.

If, however, the intended operation of the Decree is merely to forbid the importation, or to impose penalties or duties on the importation, into the territory of the Central Government by land or internal navigation, of goods originally imported from abroad into a seceded (and closed) port, other questions may arise.

The peculiar and fluctuating state of political events in New Granada renders it almost impossible to instruct Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires or Consuls effectually beforehand, as to their conduct in particular cases, which may or may not occur.

It is not (for instance) clearly explained in these papers, what measures either party is likely to take, in order to enforce any unjust or illegal claims against Her Majesty's subjects, or what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to recognizing the sovereignty and independence of the Seceded States. I presume that Her Majesty's Government considers the opposing parties as belligerents, and desires to remain neutral, just as in North America; and does not dispute that the de facto Government of the Seceded States is in a condition to maintain law and order, and to levy Customs duties at its ports.

Liability of British subjects who remain domiciled in a foreign country during civil war.

I will, therefore, confine myself to pointing out that British subjects voluntarily remaining domiciled in New Granada, during a civil war, become subject to the laws enacted by that portion of the country in which they dwell, in respect of all acts done in that country; and war, legally and in theory, renders all persons domiciled in the enemy's territory "hostile," and interdicts trade with them. If, therefore, the importation of goods from the Seceding States into the territory of the Central Government should be forbidden, or rendered penal by any local law, made in accordance with international law and usage; or even if extra duties should be expressly imposed and actually levied on all goods so imported, by whomsoever, and indiscriminately as between natives and foreigners, British subjects cannot claim any exemption from such local law or duties.

So, again, as to the right of the seceded States to levy Customs duties at the ports (against which the foreign Legations seem to have protested), if the destination of those goods be clearly the Central (and not the Seceded) territory, there seems much justice in that protest; but it remains to be seen what answer is received thereto.

The Government of the Seceded States being a de facto Government, may fairly say, "If you import goods into our territory, you shall pay the duties: and if you will not pay them, you shall not land or import the goods here, whatever may be their alleged destination."

The Decree of Señor Mosquera, December 31, 1860, appears to me to be fairly open to the objections stated in Mr. Griffith's despatch No. 11, January 31, 1861.

The letter of Mr. Finner can only receive a formal and courteous acknowledgment. The notice or communication of Señor Martin to the New Granadian Consul at Liverpool is not formally or officially before Her Majesty's Government, but, probably, your Lordship may inquire of Señor Martin whether his Government seriously means to establish a blockade of the ports in question, and, if so, with what force; or what is the meaning of this "notice."

I regret not to be able to render your Lordship more effectual assistance; but I must observe that the words of the Decrees are vague: there is no statement of the precise form or manner in which it is expected they will be enforced; and, lastly, no one case has as yet arisen calling for official intervention.

It is not generally advisable to enter into discussions of abstract principles with the authorities of these ephemeral South American Governments; and the principles of international law cannot always be rigorously acted on in relation to them, owing to the mixture of weakness and severity which they so frequently evince in their conduct towards foreign merchants.

Imprisonment of Mr. Moss.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 23rd May ultimo, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a letter from Mr. Moss, senior, dated the 20th ultimo, inclosing a copy of an Address forwarded to his son by the merchants at Yokohama, and to request that we would take into our consideration the statements it contains relative to the offence on account of which Mr. Moss, junior, was convicted in the Consular Court, and that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion thereupon, at the same time that we report upon the drafts of despatches and letters in this case, which were sent for our consideration on the 4th ultimo.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this Address requires no comment from us.

It adds no very important facts or observations to those already brought under our notice, and most of its arguments are anticipated in our Report of the 26th of April.* It appears to us to be ably composed, and should be forwarded to Mr. Alcock, if he is not already in possession of a copy.

Laws of Florence with regard to succession to personal property.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 11, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Clayton and Son, dated the 6th instant, requesting to be supplied with certain information as to the laws of Florence with regard to the succession to personal property; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether your Lordship could properly interfere for the purpose of obtaining the information sought for by the parties.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That your Lordship's question must be answered in the negative.

There is not the slightest reason for complying with the extraordinary request of Messrs. Clayton and Son. There is no public question or interest involved; and the party really interested does not apply for himself. These gentlemen are solicitors, acting for their private client, whose name they do not disclose, but who, being domiciled at Florence, can have no difficulty in obtaining there the information which he requires.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs cannot undertake to procure information on questions of foreign law merely for the convenience of English solicitors; more especially when the client is himself domiciled in the foreign country as to the law of which information is sought.

As to legality of Mr. Munro, Her Majesty's Consul at Surinam, acting as administrator to three slave-estates.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 11, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd of May ultimo, in which he stated that a report having reached you that Her Majesty's Consul at Surinam was acting as administrator to three slave estates in that island, Mr. Munro was instructed to inform your Lordship whether there was any foundation for the report in question; and Lord Wodehouse was pleased to say that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the reply, dated the 29th of April ultimo, which had been received from Mr. Munro on the subject, and to request that we would favour your Lordship with our opinion as to whether Mr. Munro's proceedings, according to his own showing, are incompatible with his character as Her Majesty's Consul.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have perused Mr. Munro's statement, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Munro's proceedings, as detailed by himself, are, in our opinion, in some respects incompatible with his character as Her Majesty's Consul. We refer to—

1. His acting as attorney for his sister-in-law Mrs. Macintosh, in the management of the coffee and plantation estate called "Leliendaal," on which it appears about 180 slaves are employed; and

2. His accepting the executorship under the will of the late Gordon Macdonald; if (as we infer was the case), the two plantations "Moy" and "Perseverance," part of the estate of Mr. Macdonald, were slave plantations; for, in the former case, Mr. Munro acted as the agent of a slave-holder, and, in the latter, he held slave property himself; both acts being utterly at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the English law for the suppression of the Slave Trade.

The last act to which Mr. Munro refers (the accepting of a bequest of a partial interest in five slaves, only to proceed at once, so far as in him lay, to manumit them), appears to us to be commendable, and in no wise inconsistent with the character, with which Mr. Munro is invested, of Her Majesty's Consul.

Claim of Mr. G. Stiebel for compensation for illegal detention and imprisonment at Azua and Santo Domingo.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 12, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch, and its inclosures, received from Her Majesty's Consul in Santo Domingo (No. 17), respecting the complaint of Mr. George Stiebel, a British subject, of his having been illegally detained and imprisoned by the authorities at Azua and at Santo Domingo, in consequence of which, as well as of injury alleged to have been thereby sustained by him in a commercial speculation on which he was engaged, he claims compensation from the responsible authorities.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that I should perceive from Mr. Stiebel's account of this transaction, that upon his arrival at Azua from Hayti, on the 21st March last, he found the Spanish flag flying there in lieu of the Dominican; the Dominican portion of the island having been incorporated with the Spanish dominions on the 18th of that month, as announced in General Santana's Proclamation of that day, when the Spanish flag was hoisted in the capital.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that the Spanish Government have accepted this annexation, which Her Majesty's Government in recent despatches to Madrid have virtually recognized, although there has been no formal communication made to the Court of Madrid to that effect; and to request that I would take Mr. Stiebel's case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether sufficient grounds exist for an appeal to Madrid in the matter in question.

Mr. Hood's despatches containing the account of the annexation of Santo Domingo were inclosed for information.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That from want of any sufficient explanation of the merits of the case, either from Mr. Stiebel or the Consul, there exist, as yet, no sufficient grounds for any appeal to Madrid in this matter.

It is remarkable that the Consul, in his despatch No. 17 of March 30, should give no information either as to his belief of the truth of Mr. Stiebel's story, or of the supposed reason or pretext for his arrest.

Full information as to the real facts and merits of the case must be procurable without any great difficulty on the spot; it can be ascertained (for instance) what law or regulation Mr. Stiebel was supposed to have violated; whether he was molested by error; or how otherwise: but until this is supplied, it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to take any step.

1861

UNITED STATES.

Instructions of Rear-Admiral Milne to Commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers on coast of North America.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 13, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter, and its inclosures, from the Admiralty, dated the 10th instant, and to request that I would take into my consideration the instructions addressed by Rear-Admiral Milne, on the 30th May ultimo, to the Commanders of Her Majesty's cruizers stationed on the coast of North America for the protection of British commerce, and that I would report to your Lordship, at my earliest convenience, whether I see any reason why those instructions should not be approved.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these instructions into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I see no sufficient reason why these instructions should not, on the whole, be approved.

There are, however, two or three observations which I venture to offer thereon:—

Article I. "In any intercourse you may have with citizens of the United States, or of the Confederate States," should stand thus: "with any officers or citizens of the United or Confederate States."

Article 3. "Representing your views to the Commander of the blockading squadron," should be amended, by adding the words, "in courteous but precise terms, and with full particulars in writing; and forthwith report to me all the particulars, and sending me copies of all communications between you and such Commander, and also sending to the Admiralty copies of such reports and communications by the earliest opportunity."

With respect to Article 4, I can only say that it is a question of policy (and not of law) whether there is at present so much reason to anticipate the perpetration of piratical outrages by the Confederate privateers against British vessels and goods, as to require the issuing of such strong and peremptory orders. In the case referred to by the Admiral (18th June, 1818, South America) it appears that "divers piratical acts and outrages" had been actually committed against British vessels and goods.

With respect to Article 9, it is for Her Majesty's Government to consider whether it is practically prepared fully to adopt, and embody in the Admiral's orders, the legal observations which I have felt it my duty to offer to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the Proclamation of President Lincoln; if so, it may possibly be considered proper to give President Lincoln notice to this effect.

I presume that Her Majesty's naval officers have already been instructed in the sense suggested in paragraph 2 of my Report of the 16th May ultimo, "to watch and report instantly the manner in which the very extensive blockade is actually maintained as to each respective port (with dates and particulars)." I only mention this important matter, because I observe no allusion to it in these instructions.

I have, &c

P.S.—I request to be furnished with a copy of these instructions, when finally approved.

Inclosure in No. 126.

Instructions by Rear-Admiral Sir A. Milne for the Guidance of Cruizers employed on the Coasts of America in the Protection of British Commerce.

(Confidential.) "Nile," at Halifax, May 30, 1861.

HER Majesty having, through her Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, signified her pleasure that in the civil war raging in America her naval forces are not to indicate any partiality or preference for either party, it will be your duty to exercise the strictest neutrality between the contending parties (both of whom are recognized by Her Majesty's Government as invested with belligerent rights), and with this view you will, while preserving a firm but conciliatory demeanour, abstain in any intercourse you may have with citizens of the United or the Confederate States not only from acting but from expressing sentiments contrary to Her Majesty's pleasure, and you will enjoin the same line of conduct upon all under your orders.

Article 2. While, however, it is your duty to observe the strictest neutrality between the contending parties, it is equally an imperative duty to afford the greatest possible protection to lawful British commerce, which will be effected, on the one hand, by the blockades about to be, or which may have been, de facto established by the Northern States, and, on the other, by the letters of marque which are being issued by the Southern Confederation.

Article 3. Blockades.—The President of the United States, by his Proclamation of the 19th ultimo, declared his intention of blockading the ports of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and by his Proclamation of the 28th of that month also of those of Virginia and North Carolina, of which the blockades have been actually announced by Commodore Prendergast, commanding the United States' squadron, who states that he has sufficient force at his disposal to maintain them effectively. If such blockades are effectively established and maintained, it will be your duty to respect them, but even should the force employed be in your opinion insufficient to render the blockade effective, you will content yourself with representing your views to the Commander of the blockading squadron, so that any British sufferers whose right to claim redress might eventually be recognized by Her Majesty's Government may have the benefit of reference to your reclamations made on the spot. Should your advice in respect to such blockades be asked for by any British ships you might happen to fall in with, it would, while referring to the inclosed Queen's Proclamation of the 13th instant, which is sent herewith for your guidance, be prudent on your part simply to state that such and such places are known to be blockaded effectively, and that Her Majesty's Government had recognized each party as a belligerent, and, consequently, entitled to all the rights of war as against neutrals, avoiding as much as possible all technical points of international law upon which you, as an observer, are not called upon to act or decide, but which, if open to objection, would, in the ordinary course of events, be subsequently adjusted by the respective Governments.

Art. 4. Privateers.—The President of the Confederate States has, on the other hand, by his Proclamation of the 17th ultimo, offered letters of marque to private armed ships, which there is reason to believe will lead to the fitting-out of many privateers; and as, from the unscrupulousness with which privateering is generally conducted, British commerce may suffer severely from lawless depredations, you will adopt every possible lawful measure to protect British ships from molestation by such privateers; not hesitating, in a clear case of piracy on British ships, to deal with the aggressor as a pirate, in accordance with the instructions issued by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty on the 8th of June, 1818, which are contained in Appendices 2, page 74, of the Station Order Book.

Art. 5. It will be expedient that you should approach for observations and for necessary communication with the blockading squadrons within the limits assigned to you, but unless protection to British life should absolutely demand it, you are to avoid entering into any ports in the occupation of Confederate authorities or troops, as the visit of any of Her Majesty's ships might probably be interpreted into a disposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give countenance and support to the Secession movement, and, consequently, any step calculated to convey such an impression is to be avoided. Their Lordships' letter of the 1st March, No. 122, and of the 18th May, No. 250, and their inclosures, by which you will be strictly guided, will put you in possession of the views of Her Majesty's Government in respect to vessels flying the Palmetto, or other Secessionist flag.

Art. 6. You are to understand that, although the civil war in America confers belligerent rights on both of the contending parties, yet that the position of Great Britain remains unaltered, and, consequently, the instructions you have received prohibiting the visit or search of United States' (or Secessionist) merchant-ships, are not affected thereby. In the event, however, of falling in with a British merchant-vessel which you may have reason to suppose had not intentionally disregarded Her Majesty's Proclamation of the 13th instant above referred to, and which may have been detained by a vessel carrying a letter of marque, you would be quite justified in ascertaining the authority for, as well as the cause of, such detention.

Art. 7. You will furnish me with the usual monthly Return of the foreign vessels met with, including therein full particulars of all privateers and other suspicious vessels, and especially of all blockading squadrons fallen in with, and of which you will be careful to give the numbers, force, &c., as well as to state your opinion as to whether they are in each case adequate to maintain efficiently the blockade upon which they may be engaged.

Art. 8. Great caution is to be exercised in approaching the American coast, many of the lights being already removed, and it is not improbable that others may be dealt with in a similar manner.

Art. 9. With reference to the expressed intention of the United States to deal with Secessionist privateers as pirates, the following opinion has been given thereon by Her Majesty's Advocate-General in respect to British subjects captured in and serving in such privateers:—

"With respect to the concluding paragraph of the Proclamation relating to the treatment of Secession privateers as pirates, I do not consider it necessary at present to enter fully into its consideration.

"I will merely observe that pirates (jure gentium) are hostes omnium, common robbers upon the seas, having a general and indiscriminate animus depredandi against all persons in general, which cannot be properly predicated of rebels or insurgents acting under letters of marque from a de facto Sovereign and independent Government only seeking to capture the property of the subjects or citizens of the particular Government to which they are themselves hostile, and, above all, carrying their prizes into port for legal adjudication. Her Majesty's Government is not concerned as to the treatment which President Lincoln may choose to inflict upon any persons captured in privateers who may not be British subjects; but British subjects who are only hostile privateersmen cannot rightfully, when captured as such on the high seas, be treated as pirates, jure gentium, by President Lincoln. The laws of the United States (to which he alludes) cannot rightfully make a British subject guilty of piracy on the high seas merely for serving in a hostile privateer."

British ship "Susan G. Owens" warned off the coast of all the Southern States by United States' blockading vessel.

Doctors' Commons, June 13, 1861.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 8th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter dated the 7th instant from Messrs. Armstrong and Gerard, representing the case of their vessel, the "Susan G. Owens," which, on leaving the port of Charleston on the 13th of May, was warned by the United States' blockading vessel "Niagara" off the coast of all the Southern States of the United States, the warning being indorsed upon the ship's register; and that Messrs. Armstrong and Gerard apprehend that the effect of this proceeding may be to expose their vessel to the risk of capture, without further warning, should she return to any part of the Southern coast during the continuance of the war: and Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this case into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That as the papers actually stand, it cannot, in my opinion, be maintained, that the owners of the British vessel "Susan G. Owens" have, as yet, sustained any damage, or are entitled to any redress, by reason merely of the endorsement of that ship's register to the effect stated, namely, "Boarded, informed of the blockade, and warned off the coast of the Southern States by the United States' ship "Niagara," May 13, 1861: Edward E. Potter, United States' Navy"; and I would suggest that they should be simply informed "that Her Majesty's Government cannot, upon the facts stated in the letter, claim any redress for them, or interfere with the United States' Government on their behalf."

I may observe (confidentially) that unless the ship should hereafter be actually captured and condemned for breach of blockade, and this without receiving any further notice whatsoever of the existence of such blockade, no international question will arise out of the mere endorsement of her register, of which her owners now complain, and that, with respect to the possible effect of this endorsement upon her liability to condemnation in the hypothetical event of her being hereafter captured for attempting to enter some blockaded port of the Confederate States, without receiving any further or other notice of such blockade than this endorsement, it must remain to be seen what may be the decision of a United States' Prize Court; and, therefore, it is obviously impossible for Her Majesty's Government to express any confident opinion beforehand.

I would also observe that Her Majesty's Government has not (so far as I am aware), as yet received any accurate information as to the actual facts or dates bearing on the blockade of each or any of the ports of the Confederate States.

If, therefore, the substantial objection meant to be relied on by Messrs. Armstrong and Gerard is, that the notice endorsed was not true, in fact (the coast of all the Southern States not being blockaded on the 13th May ultimo), there is, at present, no evidence on this point to impugn the substantial correctness of the endorsement, which cannot be assumed to be untrue.

Whatever may be the ultimate result, it is obvious that Her Majesty's Government cannot at present interfere.

FRANCE.

Refusal of Governor of Sierra Leone to allow a French merchant-vessel to proceed beyond the harbour of Freetown.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 28th May ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Colonial Office of April 29, inclosing a copy of a despatch dated the 20th of May last, from the Governor of Sierra Leone, forwarding a correspondence which had passed between himself and the French Vice-Consul, in regard to an application from the latter for permission for a French merchant-vessel to proceed up the Sierra Leone river beyond the harbour of Freetown, and which the Governor had not thought it expedient to accede to.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to observe, that in transmitting this correspondence he was to state that your Lordship would be glad to be favoured by me with information as to the general law of nations bearing upon the question of the right of navigation of rivers, as well as with any observations which I might have to offer upon the particular case in question.

General question of right of navigation of rivers.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That although the attempt to comply with your Lordship's request for "information as to the general law of nations bearing upon the question of the right of navigation of rivers," would require the compilation of a treatise, it may possibly be sufficient for the immediate purpose of this case, for me to state generally that where one nation is in possession of both banks of a river at the mouth, and commands the navigable channel, which nation has not conceded the right of free navigation thereof, and where there exist no recognized "riparian" States higher up the river, there is no sufficient authority for maintaining that any other nation can, irrespectively of Treaty or usage, lawfully enforce the right of navigating the river above its mouth, and beyond the territorial limits of the State owning both banks thereof.

With respect to the particular case in question, I can only say that all material information is so effectually withheld from me that I am wholly unable to offer any useful observations.

I remark, first, that the Governor has acted by the advice of his Council, and in accordance with the professional opinion of the Chief Justice and the Queen's Advocate; but no information as to what passed at the Council Board, or as to the grounds or reasons of such advice or opinion, is forthcoming;

Secondly, the Governor states that he believes that he is acting in conformity with law and usage; whilst the letter of the French Vice-Consul of March 6, to his Excellency, solicits the "preliminary authorization in accordance with the regulations in force;" and, moreover, states that the same question has arisen twice during his Consulship, and that no objection was made to it upon the presentation of the letter of advice, and the application for authority.

The Governor's answer to the Vice-Consul takes no notice of either of these statements; nor does his despatch of March 19, 1861, allude to them; but it is obvious that full explanation of the regulations in force are necessary to the decision of the question; and the Vice-Consul's allegations should have been dealt with by the Governor in some manner.

According to my present impression of the facts, the Governor was right in his refusal; the circumstances under which such permission was granted in two former instances should nevertheless be explained, but the fact of express permission having been applied for seems conclusive against any general French claim of right.

UNITED STATES.
Articles considered contraband of war.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatches and their inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (Nos. 222 and 223), respecting the blockade of the Southern ports of North America, together with a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister (No. 224), relative to what articles are considered by the United States' Government to be contraband of war, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I might have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

(A.) As to Lord Lyons' despatch No. 244 (described as relating to what articles are considered by the United States contraband of war), I can only say that, however desirable it would be for Her Majesty's Government, in common with all neutral maritime Powers, to be furnished with a list of such articles, the Circular dated May 2nd, and signed "S. P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury," does not, in strictness, contain any such list; this Circular only interdicts the supply of certain articles to "the insurgents" (Confederate States), from or within the territory of the United States, and orders their seizure by the Custom-house officers, and reminds all persons supplying such articles to the insurgents that they are guilty of high treason.

The "second circular" (not forthcoming) is apparently disclaimed by the United States as having reference to contraband of war, and represented as only applying to the coasting-trade, from which British subjects in the United States are excluded.

I need scarcely point out that the international question of what is "contraband of war," relates to goods laden on board neutral vessels captured by a belligerent on the high seas. All British subjects and goods within the territory of the United States are legally subject to the jurisdiction, laws, and regulations of those States, so far as relates either to acts done within such jurisdiction (such, for instance, as trading with the enemy," or "high treason"), but these offences against local and municipal law, committed by those whose persons or goods are infra territorium, are different from international offences of "carrying contraband of war," which is committed, extra territorium, on board a neutral vessel out of the municipal jurisdiction; and the list or catalogue of articles now furnished, is by no means necessarily identical with that of articles "to be treated as contraband of war," and, as such, captured in British vessels on the high seas. These observations will particularly apply to the word "provisions."

It must, therefore, be kept in mind that hitherto the United States Government has not published any list or catalogue of articles to be considered internationally as contraband of war, the carrying which to the Confederate States will subject neutrals "on the high seas," to the (international) penalties of capture, and condemnation in a Prize Court administering the law of nations.

(B.) With respect to Lord Lyons' No. 222 and inclosures, I have to observe—

1. That anonymous newspaper paragraphs cannot be safely acted on in such questions.

Vessels coming out of blockaded ports with cargoes liable to capture.

2. That by international law (especially as interpreted and applied in this country) all vessels coming out of a blockaded port with cargo are primâ facie, and in strictness, liable to capture, and restitution would only take place on their proving to the satisfaction of the Prize Court adjudicating on them, that the cargo was laden or (possibly) embarked (as in lighters) before the blockade was established.

3. That the period of fourteen days, being a voluntary concession in favour of neutrals, made by the United States' Government, must, to a reasonable extent, and as to details, be subject to the construction put upon it by that Government.

4. That I have not at hand the official document granting the concession in question.

5. That it is impossible, merely upon these newspaper paragraphs, and before any specific case of serious practical hardship has actually arisen, or is adduced with all particulars, for your Lordship to instruct Lord Lyons upon this point.

(C.) With respect to Lord Lyons' No. 223 and inclosures, I observe that—

Blockade.

1. Lord Lyons has applied to Mr. Seward on behalf of the merchants as a matter of grace and favour, and that Mr. Seward's answer is not forthcoming. My opinion on these cases is therefore somewhat premature; but I can see no reason for any official support being given to Messrs. Graham's application as regards either the British ship "Roscoe," or the Russian ship "Heros," mentioned by Messrs. Graham and Co., New Orleans, or as to the cases (not named) of shipment to New Orleans, mentioned by Messrs. Peter Maxwell and Co., New Orleans.

2. The circumstance of these shipments having been made in Europe before the parties interested could have had any notice of the blockade, or even before it was established, will not of right operate to prevent the ships in question being warned off, and captured and condemned for any subsequent attempt to break an effective blockade of the port ad quem.

(D.) With respect to the cases (not named), but alluded to at page 2 of Messrs. Maxwell and Co.'s letter, of shipments made at New Orleans in vessels which have left the port, but are detained by causes beyond their control (l presume want of water or temporary obstruction of channels), no dates, names, or particulars are given; and therefore it is useless to attempt to deal with cases which are left by the parties interested entirely destitute of all necessary details. Subject to this observation, this class of cases, as far as I can at present collect the facts which are so scantily supplied, is strongly entitled to favourable consideration. Vessels which had left New Orleans outward bound, before any blockade of that port, or even after such blockade, if with cargoes laden on board before the commencement of the blockade, will, I conclude, either come within the operation of the fourteen days of grace, or will be allowed to pass out generally.

They would, at all events, according to my impression, be entitled to restitution before a Prize Court, in case of being captured and sent in for adjudication. (See 1 "Kent's Commentaries," p. 146.)

I would, in conclusion, venture to point out the urgent necessity for British subjects being required to supply names, dates, facts, and particulars in full, in all cases in which they seek for the interposition of Her Majesty's Legation; and to the expediency of distinguishing, as far as can be done, in all communications with the United States' Government, between those cases which may be susceptible of applications ad gratiam or ad misericordiam (as, for instance, vessels bound inwards to a blockaded port), and those which may deserve support as matter of international right, ex debito justitiæ, as, for instance, vessels outward bound from a blockaded port, but having actually quitted it, or having cargoes laden on board before the establishment of the blockade.

Landed property belonging to Mr. W. H. Ross, in Alexander county, Virginia, taken possession of by United States' Government.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 17, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter, dated the 11th instant, from Mr. W. H. Ross, stating that he has been informed that troops, acting under the orders of the United States' Government, have taken possession of a property belonging to him in Alexander county, Virginia, and have commenced throwing up earth-works, &c., thereby doing the estate very great injury, and requesting that your Lordship would instruct Her Majesty's Minister at Washington to make such representations to the United States' Government as may secure Mr. Ross from loss, or will advise him how to proceed in the matter.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take Mr. Ross' letter into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the answer which should be returned thereto.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken Mr. Ross' letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That an answer may be returned to Mr. Ross to the effect, "that his landed property in Virginia must be held subject to all the local obligations, laws, and regulations incident thereto.

"That it is not suggested that these have been violated in his case; or that he has as yet taken any step whatever to obtain compensation on his own behalf; or that his agent on the spot has done anything whatever in the matter. It would seem that the only information alluded to by Mr. Ross is derived from the 'New York Herald' of the 20th May ultimo, confirmed by a letter from a friend, whose address is not mentioned.

"That under these circumstances your Lordship must decline to make any representation to the Government of the United States; and that your Lordship can only advise Mr. Ross to inform himself of the facts, and of the local laws and regulations applicable to the case, and to be guided in his conduct in this matter by the opinions of the most trustworthy and competent persons in America."

Many citizens of the United States and of Virginia must be in the same position as Mr. Ross.

Claim of Mr. Rankin for losses incurred on account of his vessel "Fahrenheit" being ordered to proceed from Malaga to Port Mahon to perform quarantine.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 17, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 12th of June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. Rankin dated the 29th ultimo, setting forth the circumstances under which he requests the interference of Her Majesty's Government with the Government of Spain to obtain compensation for losses which he has incurred by the proceedings of the authorities at Malaga in directing his vessel, the "Fahrenheit," to proceed to perform quarantine at Port Mahon; and to request that I would take this paper into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to whether Her Majesty's Government will be justified in interfering in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Mr. Rankin would seem to have a primâ facie case of serious complaint, and Her Majesty's Government may probably be ultimately justified in taking up the case; but inasmuch as there is nothing from the Consulate at Malaga, and no information as to the Spanish Sanitary Regulations, or the particular circumstances on which Mr. Rankin relies in support of his claim for compensation, Her Majesty's Government is not at present in a position to address the Spanish Government on the question.

I would beg to refer to my Report of June 18 and August 8, 1860, on the case of the "Azorian," and to be informed of the result of that case.

I would suggest that the points to be kept in view are chiefly—

1. Was the conduct of the Spanish authorities strictly legal or illegal, under the existing Laws and Regulations?
2. If illegal, on what ground?
3. If not illegal, was it so unreasonable and oppressive as to justify the interference of Her Majesty's Government, and on what ground?
4. Is the fault in the Regulations themselves, or in the manner in which they were interpreted and enforced at Malaga?
5. Is this case one of a class, or is it exceptional?
6. Were any and what steps taken on behalf of the owner at the time, at Malaga; and if not, why not?

I may add that, from the extensive British trade with Malaga, the case assumes an important practical aspect, and the Consul should report fully on it.

Information desired by Messrs. Fernie, Brothers and Co., as to blockade of Southern coast of United States.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 18, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Messrs. Fernie, Brothers and Co., stating that they are highly interested, either as owners or ship's husbands, in shipping, and they have now in Liverpool two vessels, the "Ellen" and the "Essex," which they propose to send to Savannah, Georgia.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that Messrs. Fernie and Co. have, however, observed that the "Hilja" was boarded off Charleston on the 12th May, by a boat from the United States' blockading vessel "Niagara," and was warned off the whole Southern coast of the United States. That they also know that the "Monmouth" was likewise ordered away from Charleston, and that when she proposed to go into Savannah, she was informed that she could not go in there, as that port was blockaded; although, as Messrs. Fernie affirm, it was well known that there was at that time no blockading force off the port of Savannah.

That Messrs. Fernie and Co. also refer to a notice issued by Her Majesty's Consul at New Orleans, on the 17th of May, in which he stated that he had not even then received any official notice as to the time when the blockade of the Mississippi river would be established.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that under these circumstances Messrs. Fernie and Co. request to be informed whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information as to the nature and extent of the blockade actually put into operation by the United States; and to request that I would take Messrs. Fernie and Co.'s letter into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with my opinion as to the answer which should be returned thereto.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to add, that the notice mentioned by Messrs. Fernie and Co. as having been issued by Mr. Moore has not yet been received at the Foreign Office.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That your Lordship will perceive that the answer to be given to this question depends to some extent upon the information actually in possession of Her Majesty's Government, "of the nature and extent of the blockade actually put into operation by the United States;" on this point I have no knowledge whatsoever.

There is too much reason to apprehend that Her Majesty's Government has not any full or exact information on the subject; and that it has not even the same amount of information thereon as is possessed by many private persons in this country; but it is not expedient to say this.

I can only therefore suggest that some decorously evasive and official answer should be given to Messrs. Fernie and Co., to the effect that your Lordship "regrets that it is not in your power to give them the information which they request," or to some similar effect.

Seizure of the "Hiawatha" and "Crenshaw" by blockading squadron, and sent to New York for condemnation. Claim of Messrs. John Gilliat and Co.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 14th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter dated the 11th instant, from Messrs. John Gilliat and Co., stating the nature of their interest in the cargoes of the British barque "Hiawatha" and the American schooner "Crenshaw," which it is affirmed have been seized by the United States' blockading squadron, and sent to New York to be condemned; and that Messrs. Gilliat and Co. request that instructions may be addressed to Her Majesty's Consul at that port with a view to the protection of their property, and to its being allowed to proceed to its destination.

And Mr. Hammond was pleased to request that I would take this case into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Messrs. Gilliat and Co. do not state from what port either vessel sailed, or on what ground it is supposed that either was captured. The captures are said to have been made by "the blockading squadron of the United States," and therefore (I presume) for breach of blockade; but of what port, or whether by egress or ingress, does not appear.

The "Crenshaw" is stated to be an American barque, but it is not stated who are her owners, or whether they are domiciled in the Northern (United) States, or in the United (Confederate) States; Messrs. Gilliat and Co. appear to be interested in part of the cargo of each ship.

Her Majesty's Consul at New York cannot, merely on this imperfect statement, be instructed, as requested, to interfere so that "Messrs. Gilliat and Co.'s property may be protected, and allowed to proceed to its destination;" or to interfere at all.

These captures cannot be assumed to be unjustifiable, or in breach of international law. Messrs. Gilliat and the other parties interested must proceed as claimants in the Prize Court, or otherwise, as they may be advised.

The case of the "Hiawatha," being the first British ship of the capture of which Her Majesty's Government has, as far as I am aware, received intelligence, should be particularly recommended to the attention of the Consul.

Her Majesty's Consul at Richmond (who is referred to by Messrs. Gilliat) should be requested to report, and forward all particulars within his knowledge.

Cases of the "Monmouth" and "Hilja," ordered off the port of Charleston by United States' blockading vessel.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 13th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me—

1. A letter dated the 11th instant from Mr. Horsfall, inclosing further papers respecting the cases of the "Monmouth" and the "Hilja," which were ordered off the port of Charleston by the United States' blockading ship "Niagara;" and

2. A despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Charleston (No. 63, May 2), reporting that the "Niagara" had disappeared, and that that port was consequently entirely open; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations which I might have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I can only refer to my Report of the 6th June instant,* as to which these papers do not alter my opinion.

I may add, that at the time the "Monmouth" and the "Hilja" were warned off Charleston (namely, the 12th May), the port seems to have been effectually blockaded.

The circumstance that the blockade was subsequently, on and after the 15th May, abandoned, relaxed, or interrupted, will not therefore affect the validity of the warning off, as regards these two ships. As regards the "Hilja," I have (in my former Report) observed that she had no alternative destination; and I cannot at present see how her owners can be entitled to compensation, merely by reason that when she was warned off Charleston (the port of her destination, which was then blockaded), she was also warned off other ports to which she had no destination; all of which may not have been then blockaded.

The "Monmouth" may possibly (as I have therein pointed out) have some claim in respect of her alternative destination to Savannah; but upon this point I need not at present repeat my opinion, inasmuch as the facts and details are still wanting.

Mr. Consul Bunch should be requested to explain on what grounds he expressed, in his letter to Messrs. Mure and Co. of May 18, his individual opinion that the owners of these ships have a fair claim for compensation and damages from the Government of the United States.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 6th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Mr. Hood, Her Majesty's Consul at San Domingo (No. 16), adverting to the position in which certain Protestant chapels at Dominican ports under the Treaty between Great Britain and the Dominican Republic of 1850, and to which schools have since been attached, will be placed, in regard to the question of religious toleration, in consequence of the recent annexation of San Domingo to Spain; since there appears reason to apprehend that the Spanish Government may not grant a greater amount of toleration to such establishments in San Domingo, under the new order of things, than is shown in Spain.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that the question of the recognition by Great Britain of the annexation of San Domingo to Spain is treated of in his letter of the 6th June instant, inclosing a further despatch from Mr. Hood; and to request that I would take the question now submitted to me into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the course which Her Majesty's Government should take in the matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Consul should merely be instructed to report fully upon any attempt which may be made by the Spanish authorities to interfere with the British chapels or schools, or with the British burial-grounds, at San Domingo; and should any such attempt be made, he should officially request the Spanish authorities to inform him of the particular ground or authority under which they act in relation thereto; non constat, as yet, however, that any such attempts will be made.

As to the schools, the Treaty is silent; and I am not aware of the legal authority for their erection and appropriation, nor in whom they are legally vested, in trust or otherwise, which should be explained.

If Her Majesty is about to recognize the acquisition of the Dominican Republic by Spain, it will perhaps think fit, as a condition precedent, to insist on the Treaty of 1850 being acceded to by the latter Power as binding on it. Should this not be done at the time of recognition, some difficulties may be expected to arise in relation to the future position and status of British subjects and British interests in the (heretofore) Republic, now practically annexed to Spain.

Discontinuance of blockade of Charleston. Cases of the "Monmouth" and "Hilja."

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 24, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 241, of June 3), inclosing a copy of the answer returned by Mr. Seward to the note addressed to him by Her Majesty's Minister, respecting the discontinuance of the blockade of Charleston, of which a copy was submitted to me in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 5th June instant.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to inclose, together with the former papers, the draft of a despatch which was addressed to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington on the 8th June instant, showing the nature of the instructions with which he has been furnished in regard to the cases of the "Monmouth" and the "Hilja," and to state that he has been furnished (confidentially) with a copy of my Report of the 6th June.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that unless I should be of opinion that the papers now sent throw any further light upon those two cases, your Lordship conceives that it may be desirable to await the receipt of further information before coming to any final decision in regard to them; and to request that I would take into consideration the answer returned by Mr. Seward to Lord Lyons respecting the absence of any blockading force from the port of Charleston, and that I would favour your Lordship with my opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as it is highly desirable at present to avoid discussions upon abstract principles of international law with the Government of the United States, and only to interfere officially in particular cases, when British subjects have clearly sustained substantial losses or actual wrongs, for which neither the Prize Court nor any other Courts will afford them any redress, and when all the necessary particulars are fully supplied, I am happy to observe that (as far as I can judge from Lord Lyons' No. 141) no international discussion need apparently be raised as to the blockade of Charleston, excepting possibly in the case of the "Monmouth;" and if this should turn out to be the case, it will be very desirable to avoid a critical international discussion upon this single case.

The United States' Government appears to me upon the whole to have acted liberally in regard to this blockade, and it may be proper at a convenient time for Her Majesty to acknowledge that it has done so.

I observe, however, that Mr. Seward and Consul Bunch are at variance as to the facts and dates.

Mr. Seward in his note of the 27th May intimates that the blockade was only intermitted for a day or two between the departure of the "Niagara" and the arrival of the "Harriet Lane;" whilst Lord Lyons (citing Consul Bunch's No. 66) infers that the blockade was intermitted from the 16th to the 28th of May.

Under these circumstances I abstain from troubling your Lordship at present with any observations on the abstract legal considerations applicable to intermissions of blockade.

Lord Lyons has in my opinion decided rightly in abstaining from bringing any particular case before the United States' Government without instructions from your Lordship, and there is no necessity for coming (as yet) to any final decision upon either of these two cases.

I have, &c.

Case of the "Fahrenheit."

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 25, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 21st June instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 17th June instant,* regarding the case of the "Fahrenheit," he was directed to state to me that Mr. Mark, Her Majesty's Consul at Malaga, is at present in this country on leave of absence, and that your Lordship is of opinion that it may be convenient that I should be placed in communication with Mr. Mark in this matter.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that, if I should have no objection to this step, he would be glad to learn from me the day and hour on which it may be convenient for me to receive Mr. Mark.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to acquaint me that the decision of the Portuguese (qy. Spanish) Council in the case of the "Azorian" has not as yet been made known to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Rankin's letter of the 29th of May last was inclosed for reference, and is herewith returned.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I presume that the word "Spanish" should be substituted for "Portuguese" Council, as applied to the case of the "Azorian" in Lord Wodehouse's letter.

I beg to suggest that Consul Mark should see all the papers, including my Report of the 17th June instant (herewith returned), on the case of the "Fahrenheit," and should also see all the papers (including my Reports) in the case of the "Azorian;" if when he has read them he will let me know, I will make an appointment with him, and I shall be happy to see him on the subject.

Mixed Commission of claims at Rio.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 24, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 12th June instant, stating that with reference to our previous Reports as to the questions which have arisen regarding the Mixed Commission at Rio, he was directed to transmit to us the correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Minister at Rio (No. 41), and the Brazilian Government, since the matter was last submitted to us, and especially a despatch from Mr. Christie (No. 53), inclosing a note which he has received from the Brazilian Minister for Foreign Affairs, in reply to a note which he had addressed to him, with a view to ascertaining the views of the Brazilian Government as to whether the Convention is to be considered as having now fallen to the ground.

And Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to request that we would take these papers into consideration, together with the previous correspondence, and report to your Lordship our opinion whether Her Majesty's Government will be justified in maintaining that the Convention has expired.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That even if it were true that the sittings of the Commissioners were suspended on account of "unforeseen and unavoidable circumstances," still the powers of the Commissioners would not have continued beyond the two years mentioned in the IIIrd Article, except under mutual agreement of both Governments for an extension of time; there has not been (as we collect) any such mutual agreement, and, therefore, until such agreement be made, the powers of the Commissioners must be considered as no longer subsisting.

Mrs. Parry's complaint against Mr. Hornby in the case of Crawford v. Parry. Mr. Hornby's explanation satisfactory.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 25, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 11th June instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us, with reference to our report of the 25th April ultimo,* a despatch from Mr. Hornby (No. 42 of May 29, 1861), containing his own remarks on Mrs. Parry's letter of the 2nd February ultimo, and inclosing Mr. Vice-Consul Wroth's report and notes of the trial in the case of "Crawford v. Parry," and to request that we would take these papers into consideration, and report our opinion as to the further steps, if any, which should be taken in the matter.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to transmit to us, with reference to the concluding passages of Mr. Hornby's despatch, the instruction which, as we were informed by Mr. Hammond's letter of the 12th March ultimo, your Lordship was prepared to address to Mr. Hornby; and he was also pleased to state that your Lordship thought it right that we should be apprized that your Lordship had not hesitated at once to express to Mr. Hornby your entire satisfaction with the clear and explicit answer which he had given to the inquiry which has given him so much pain, and which your Lordship only put to him on account of the view which we seemed to entertain of Mr. Hornby's conduct.

Mr. Hammond was also pleased to state that we should observe that Mr. Hornby has accidentally omitted to sign his despatch, but that he would be desired to send a signed duplicate.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are happy to be able to state that Mr. Hornby's answer to the Refusal of the Porte to allow Mrs. Abbott to open a calico manufactory at Smyrna.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 26, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 17th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me the accompanying despatch and its inclosure from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople (No. 383), respecting the refusal of the Porte to allow Mrs. Abbott to open a calico manufactory at Smyrna, and to request that I would take this question into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether there is anything in the Treaty stipulations between Great Britain and Turkey which would justify Her Majesty's Government in interfering on behalf of Mrs. Abbott.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this question into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I am not aware of any Treaty stipulation whatsoever on this subject; but I would request that, if any such exists, it may be pointed out.

I observe that Sir H. Bulwer states (at page 2 of No. 383) that Consul Blunt is of opinion that the conferring of the exclusive privilege in question by Vizirial order, "is contrary to the Treaties with Great Britain." No Treaty is mentioned, and no reason is stated.

The Memorandum from Aali Pasha to Sir H. Bulwer of the 13th May is in very vague terms, and no information is given as to the actual state and working of the law and practice of Turkey as to the issuing of these exclusive privileges to carry on a particular manufacture at a particular place.

The general question is one of importance to British interests, and these papers contain, in my opinion, no exact or sufficient information upon it, and leave it involved in much obscurity.

It is obvious that if there be anything contrary to Treaty in these exclusive grants or concessions, this should be pointed out; and that however this may be, the state of the matter should be fully explained and considered, with a view to future cases.

These papers, as they stand, are quite useless for any practical purpose.

Complaint of Mr. Harley, master of the "Culloden," of ill-treatment and confinement at Mobile.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 27, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Mr. Hammond's letter of the 17th June instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 11th March last, he was directed to transmit to me, together with the former papers, a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 161), inclosing such further information as the present Acting Consul at Mobile has been able to obtain in regard to the ill-treatment complained of by Mr. Harley, the master of the British ship "Culloden," and to request that I would take these further papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations I may have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the depositions (especially those of the master and mates of the 1861

"Culloden") appear to me to show that their conduct to Anna McDonnell was not only illegal, but unmanly and disgraceful.

In my opinion the master, even on his own showing, may well have deserved the "tarring and feathering" with which he was threatened, but which was not inflicted on him. I should certainly advise your Lordship not to interfere to obtain any compensation for him from the authorities at Mobile, who succeeded in protecting him from the violence threatened; it is only to be regretted that such things can be done with perfect impunity to female passengers in British ships.

With respect to his imprisonment by the Consul, and to the general circumstances of the case, I can only say that there is no information whatsoever forthcoming; and the inability of Acting Consul Magee to supply any information as to such imprisonment, or on the other matters of so much recent notoriety, is to me, I own, incomprehensible.

Intention to declare ports of Seceded States to be no longer ports of entry, and to confiscate any vessel resorting thereto. Evasion of international law respecting blockade.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 25, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 20th of June instant, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the accompanying despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (Nos. 212 and 240), relative to the measures which it is proposed to ask Congress to adopt at its meeting on the 4th of next month.

That among those proposed measures, is said to be one giving to the President the right to declare the ports of the Seceded States to be no longer ports of entry, and to confiscate any vessel which shall attempt to resort to them; the apparent object of this measure (as stated by Her Majesty's Minister) being to free the United States' Government from the obligation of observing the rules of international law respecting the blockade, but especially to do away with the necessity of keeping at all times a force on the coast sufficient to render it effective.

Lord Wodehouse was pleased to request that we would take into our consideration the project said to be entertained by the United States' Government for closing the Southern ports by the means above indicated.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That any attempt on the part of the Northern (United) States to close, by an Act of Congress, all the ports in the Southern (Confederate) States against British commerce, would be inconsistent with the pacific and commercial relations at present subsisting between the "United States of America" and this country.

Further, we are of opinion that no belligerent Power has a right, by mere prohibitory enactment, to require neutral nations to abstain from all commercial dealings with another belligerent Power, which would be the result of the expected enactment. Such a right can extend only to ports of which the belligerent is in actual possession, and into which he can therefore not only forbid entry, but by competent force upon the spot give effect to such prohibition. We are, therefore, of opinion that any paper enactment by Congress, to the effect anticipated by Lord Lyons, may be treated as nugatory by the Law of Nations; and any attempt to enforce it by the seizure and confiscation of a neutral ship may be justly regarded as an act of hostility.

We would suggest the expediency of this country and other European Powers concurring in a representation to this effect to the Government of the Northern (United) States.

Claim of Mr. Carwell to administer to property of late Mr. Michael Winder.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 25, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th May ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us for consideration two further despatches (Nos. 17 and 18), with their inclosures, from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Peru, relating to the administration to the estate of the late Michael Winder.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th June instant, transmitting our former Report of the 29th May ultimo,* together with the former papers on this subject.

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 18th June instant, transmitting a further despatch from Mr. Jerningham (No. 21), together with a letter, dated the 13th instant, from M. Osma, the Peruvian Minister at this Court, relative to this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the papers transmitted with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 30th May ultimo do not appear to us to require any important observations, the whole question, in its present state and condition, being (in effect) disposed of by our former Report of the 29th of May.

Mr. Jerningham on receiving the receipt (transmitted with the papers) rightly returned the property deposited with him to those who had deposited it.

We forbear to enter into the correspondence between Mr. Jerningham and the Peruvian Government, which was begun and carried on by him under imperfect information as to the law of the case.

The liability of the Peruvian Government in respect of any "laches" relating to the bonds, or to the non-arrest of Winder, or in respect of Mr. Carwell's somewhat singular demand of 250*l. per diem* (in the nature of damages in respect of his arrest) cannot be finally considered until the termination of the legal proceedings now pending.

The papers transmitted with Lord Wodehouse's note of the 18th June disclose an apparent want of good faith on the part of the Peruvian authorities, especially of Señor Melgar, as remarked by Mr. Jerningham.

Señor Melgar is, moreover, connected with Mrs. Winder (Mr. Carwell's opponent); and the facts alleged by Mr. Carwell in his letters No. 17 of the 19th April, and No. 18 of the 20th April, as to the improper means used by the Government to deter one of his counsel (Señor Zejeda) from continuing to act for him, and the suspicious communication held with another of his counsel (Señor Albertini) have a most discreditable aspect; but we do not see how Her Majesty's Government can officially interfere further at present, or, indeed, at all pendente lite.

The Peruvian Courts (as we have explained in our former Report) have jurisdiction over the property locally situate in Peru; and Mr. Jerningham's attention is fully alive to the importance of the case, and to the suspicious conduct of the authorities.

We do not see, under all the circumstances, how any further instructions can usefully be sent to him.

Arrest of Captain M. White on charge of attempt on the life of General Castilla in 1860.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th June instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us two despatches from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Peru (Nos. 14 and 16), inclosing correspondence regarding the arrest of Captain Melville White on a charge of being concerned in an attempt on the life of General Castilla in 1860.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to inclose a note dated the 13th of May last, which had been received on the subject from M. de Osma, the Peruvian Minister at this Court, and to request that we would take the papers into our consideration and report to your Lordship our opinion as to the course to be taken by Her Majesty's Government in the matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken the papers submitted to us into our consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the first question to be considered is, was the arrest, imprisonment, and general treatment of Mr. White, strictly legal, or illegal, by Peruvian law?

Upon this material question we can find but little information in Mr. Jerningham's despatches and notes.

In his note to Señor Melgar of April 17, Mr. Jerningham states that "it is against the law of Peru to arrest a person without exhibiting a written order issued by a competent authority, except of cases of in fragrante (in flagranti)." He does not cite this law by reference, and he refers to no other law. It is not suggested by him, for instance, that Mr. White may not be legally kept in prison, and in solitary confinement for an indefinite period, or as long as the Peruvian Government may choose.

It is, indeed, scarcely conceivable that such should be the law of Peru: and if Mr. White's arrest and imprisonment should turn out to be illegal, or if the provisions of the law in his favour have been disregarded, the case will assume a very serious aspect.

Assuming, however, that the law of Peru has not been violated or disregarded, then we can only suggest that Mr. Jerningham should be instructed to use all his efforts, adopting a courteous and moderate tone in his official correspondence, to induce the Peruvian Government, (1), to mitigate the extreme severity of Mr. White's treatment; (2), to allow him to know the precise crime with which he is charged; (3), to allow him to see the British Consul and his legal adviser from time to time under reasonable restrictions; (4), to hasten his trial.

We would also suggest that Señor Osma's note of the 13th May to your Lordship may properly be answered to the effect that your Lordship has heard with pain and surprise that Mr. White was arrested and placed in severe and solitary confinement ("incomunicado") on the 23rd March ultimo, and had apparently so continued up to the 28th April; that he was treated with great personal indignity and severity; that he received no written document containing any notice of the charge on which he was imprisoned; that he had not been confronted with any witness, nor subjected to any public preliminary hearing or proceeding, nor allowed to see any legal adviser; and that all substantial information as to the motives for this extraordinary severity had been withheld from Mr. Jerningham, and all explanation refused notwithstanding his application for it.

That your Lordship was at a loss to comprehend how such treatment of a British subject, even if technically justified by Peruvian law (which remained to be seen), could be seriously adopted and defended by the Peruvian Government as being in accordance with the ordinary usage and comity of civilized nations; that M. Osma must be aware that no Peruvian could possibly be thus treated in England; and that, far from disapproving Mr. Jerningham's conduct, your Lordship must, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, insist upon receiving a prompt and satisfactory explanation of the whole matter, and must invite the most serious attention of the Peruvian Government to all the circumstances of the case of Mr. White, and require: (1), that he receive distinct legal notice of the charge against him; (2), that he have access to legal advice; (3), that his public and legal trial be expeditiously and duly proceeded with."

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 28, 1861.

NEW GRANADA.

Right of New Granada to prohibit a direct trade between its own ports and those held by its opponents.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 18th June instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 8th June instant,* respecting the closing of New Granadian ports, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch (No. 19) from Mr. Henderson, Her Majesty's Consul at Panamá, in the third inclosure in which a question has been raised as to the right of the New Granadian Government to prohibit a direct trade being carried on between its own ports and those held by its opponents.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that as this question does not appear to have been raised in the former papers submitted to me, he was to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion whether this prohibition can be legally enforced by the authorities in the New Granadian ports upon British ships.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this question into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That both Commodore Dunlop and Consul Henderson appear to me to have taken a correct view of this question.

The Commodore's order of the 30th April, if taken with the qualification of the Consul's despatch to Captain Bruce of May 13, will properly deal with the case.

Subject to this observation, and so far as I can understand the actual state of the facts, your Lordship's question must be answered in the affirmative.

Nothing is stated in the papers as to the right of British vessels to carry on the coasting (or intermediate) trade between two or more New Granadian ports, and the Treaty of 1825 (Columbia) appears to contain no stipulation on this point. Something may, however, turn upon the scale on which the measure in question is attempted to be carried out. A Federal Government may, for instance, be justified in closing (say) one or two ports in the temporary occupation of revolters; but if the revolters acquire by time and circumstances, and by the nature and extent of the quarrel, the consistency, power, and resources of a separate and independent Government, claiming to be so treated, acting as such, and formally and permanently seceding from the Federation, occupying and retaining in full possession many ports and a large extent of coast, and if the coasting or intermediate trade is not dependent on the absolute discretion of the Federal Government, but is secured under a "most favoured nation clause" in a Treaty, or by any formal or binding Act, the Federal Government must resort to an effective blockade, and cannot permanently do, merely on paper, what it cannot effectually do in fact.

I am wholly ignorant of the circumstances actually existing in New Granada, but I perceive with satisfaction that no British vessel has been as yet molested or seriously threatened by either party.

I would suggest that it may be desirable in such cases for the British authorities to concert measures, where practicable, for acting in the same sense with the other European Maritime Powers in regard to questions of this character.

I beg to refer to the Report of the Law Officers of June 25th, on the question of the right of the United States' Government to close Southern ports by an Act of Congress.

The despatch No. 19, from Mr. Henderson, Her Majesty's Consul at Panamá, transmitted with these papers, has been sent to the Foreign Office, in pursuance of Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th June instant.

Complaint of Messrs. Crossthwaite and Co. of forcible impressment of men for military service.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 29, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 19th June instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch (No. 18) from Mr. Griffith, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Bogotá, regarding a representation which he has received from Messrs. Crossthwaite and Co., complaining of certain proceedings of the New Granadian authorities on the occasion of the forcible impressment of men for the military service of the Republic; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether the case of Messrs. Crossthwaite is one in which Her Majesty's Government would be justified in interfering.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, according to my present impression, your Lordship's question must be answered in the affirmative.

I observe in Mr. Griffith's No. 18, that Messrs. Daniel and Leopold Schloss, partners in the firm of Crossthwaite and Co., are expected in this country, and will furnish Her Majesty's Government with further information.

I would further point out—

1. That the general question involved in this case is one of extreme importance to British interests; for if the Government of New Granada can impress for military service, at its arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion, all the labourers of one person or class of persons (exclusively), it can ruin, with impunity, any or all of those British subjects employing and dependent on numerous labourers, towards whom it may entertain unfavourable feelings; and, considering the circumstances of the country, this state of things may lead to very serious results.

2. Mr. Griffith's well-founded apprehension of such cases giving a great deal of official and international trouble seems to me to be no sufficient reason for the acquiescence of Her Majesty's Government. The wrong complained of was done by the direct authority of the Executive Government, acting under colour of law, during a civil war, and a resort to the local tribunals in New Granada would be practically useless in such a case.

3. It is to be regretted that Messrs. Crossthwaite have not forwarded a copy, or full explanation, of the particular Article of the Constitution and Law which they suggest to have been violated; together with the text, or a full explanation of the law, if any, under which the Government assumes to be authorized or justified in what it has done; for the first question to be settled is, was this impressment legal or illegal, and, in either event, on what authority or grounds?

Action at law in a Greek Court between two Ionians. Right of property to brig "Solon."

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 1, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 25th of June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Consul at Patras (No. 28, June 6, 1861), requesting instructions as to the course which he should pursue in a case of an action at law brought in a Greek Court, between two Ionian subjects, in a question of right of property to the Ionian brig "Solon;" and to request that I would report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be given to Mr. Ongley in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands, I have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the Consul should be instructed not to interfere at all in this case.

It is not stated that any of the parties concerned have asked for his interference; the Ionian Government has not requested it; and Her Majesty's Government has no interest in the matter. The case is full of complication, and probable fraud, which may be very properly investigated by a legal Tribunal.

It is a private dispute between Ionians, two of whom are brothers, having opposite interests. Any Consular intervention would be either useless or prejudicial to some, if not to all, of the parties concerned, whose conflicting claims involve questions of law and fact, with which neither Her Majesty's Government nor that of Ionia has any concern.

I observe that the Consul does not transmit the papers, or explain the circumstances which have already induced Sir Thomas Wyse to interfere (ineffectually) in this case.

With respect to the 179th Article of the "Instructions of the Board of Trade," I have to observe—

1st. That these instructions, as is apparent from their "heading," refer to British ships exclusively.

2ndly. That, although not very distinctly worded, neither this Article (nor any Article) could reasonably be intended, or so construed, as to direct the Consul, in cases where the parties litigant are all British or Ionians, to interfere in favour of the defendants exclusively; or, in other words, to "obtain the release" from arrest of any British or Ionian vessels arrested at the suit of a British or Ionian plaintiff; for the plaintiff is, obviously, at least as likely to be right as the defendant, and Her Majesty's Government must act with impartiality between them.

The Article, in my opinion, is intended to apply only to cases of British vessels detained or arrested abroad at the suit or instance of foreigners.

The Consul should carefully abstain from official interference in any litigation existing in Greece between British or Ionians, inter se, without specific instructions to the contrary effect; any deviation from this rule may involve him and Her Majesty's Government in serious consequences.

The Consul should be cautioned to consider and construe the Instructions of the Board of Trade with more care, discretion, and common sense, than he would seem to have done in this case.

Blockade of port of Charleston.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 2, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June ultimo,[*] stating that with reference to my Report of the 24th June ultimo, he was directed to transmit to me a further despatch, and its inclosures, from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 268), and also a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Charleston (No. 66), respecting the question of the blockade of that port.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that the papers forwarded by Lord Lyons contain the particulars of the case of the British vessel "Eliza and Catherine," and that Mr. Consul Bunch adverts to the course pursued by him with regard to applications made to him, since the blockade became effective, to convert American into British vessels; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to offer upon their contents.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That these papers do not appear to me to call for any observations, excepting:—

1st. That the United States' Flag Officer Stringham, of the "Minnesota," appears to have acted liberally and courteously in the case of the "Eliza and Catherine."

2ndly. That the contention of Mr. Secretary Seward in his note to Lord Lyons of the 27th May (alluded to in my Report of the 24th June), to the effect that this blockade was only intermitted for a day or two between the departure of the "Niagara" and the arrival of the "Harriett Lane," appears to be discredited by the facts now stated by Consul Bunch.

3rdly. That the Consul's proceedings appear to have been judicious and correct.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch, and its inclosure, from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 269), respecting the blockade of the Mississippi; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations which I may have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That these papers do not appear to me to require any observations.

The Consul does not distinctly state on and from what day the blockade was actually established by the "Brooklyn;" but I conclude that this was the 27th May.

I have some reason to believe (but from newspapers only), in confirmation of Lord Lyons' impression as to the instructions issued to the blockading force, that the ships alluded to have, in fact, been allowed to pass out without molestation.

Liability of Daniel Swan, a British subject domiciled in the Netherlands, to military service.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 3, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 27th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague (No. 19), setting forth the circumstances under which the Netherlands Government claim the military services of a British subject born in Scotland of British parents, and subsequently domiciled in the Netherlands; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion on the points submitted by Sir Andrew Buchanan.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 1st July instant, transmitting a further despatch from Sir A. Buchanan respecting the case of Daniel Swan.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1st. That no copy of the Law of Holland (under which Daniel Swan's liability to military service is alleged to arise) being with the papers, I can express no opinion thereupon.

2nd. I perceive that he has presented a petition to the King, which may be favourably received, and pending which he has received six weeks' leave of absence; this petition, if granted, will dispose of the case as far as he is personally concerned; he would thus seem to have (in effect) conceded the liability in question. A copy of this petition should be forwarded.

3rd. The principle involved is very important to all British subjects domiciled in Holland, and it is singular that if the Dutch law is as stated, this should be apparently the first case of the kind which has occurred. This question should be cleared up: "Has the law been invariably hitherto construed and enforced as now, in this class of cases; or is this the first case in which the point has arisen?"

4th. The best legal opinion in Holland should be obtained on the case of Swan, and transmitted with a copy and translation of the text of the law. The extreme consequences which will ensue from the law being applied as proposed should be suggested in the case, and a question should be put to the Advocate consulted as to whether any, and what, legal means of obtaining redress, or of raising the question of his liability to serve, are open to Daniel Swan.

5th. When the precise state of the Dutch law is ascertained, the propriety of making a communication to the Dutch Government, and the terms of that communication, may be further considered.

6th. In the event of Swan's petition to the King being complied with, the international question will be (for the present) waived or postponed, or rather none will have formally arisen; the general principle involved should nevertheless be cleared up.

Temporary suspension of postal service in certain of the States of America.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, June 25, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 22nd June instant, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us two letters (dated the 10th and 12th instant), and inclosures, from the General Post Office, from which we should perceive that the Postmaster-General of the United States notified on the 25th ultimo the temporary suspension, from and after the 31st ultimo, of the postal service in certain of the States of America, and announced that letters for offices temporarily closed by that order would be forwarded to the United States' Dead Letter Office; and that we should also perceive that in consequence of that announcement a notice has been published by Her Majesty's Postmaster-General, stating that all letters sent to the Dead Letter Office at Washington would be returned to the Dead Letter Office in London, where they would be opened and sent back to the writers.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that it appeared, however, from the inclosed further letter from the General Post Office, dated the 20th instant, that a question has arisen as to how far the United States' Post Office has the right, under the Post Office Convention with this country of the 15th December, 1848, to detain or to return to this country letters addressed to any place in the United States, more particularly paid letters, upon which the United States' rate of postage has been collected in advance, and accounted for to the United States' Post Office; and that he was, therefore, to request that we would take this matter into consideration, and favour your Lordship with our opinion thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That it is true that, by the Convention with the United States, they are bound to convey letters duly posted in the United Kingdom to all parts of the United States; and it is also true that the Northern States contend that the country of the Southern States is still part of the territory of the United States, and that all the rights, and therefore all the obligations, of the United States belong to them (the Northern States); but, notwithstanding this alleged abstract right, it is clear that, in practice, foreign letters and correspondence addressed to the Southern States could not be transmitted from the Northern to the Southern States except by means of some mutual agreement between the two parties, which this country cannot reasonably require the Northern States to enter into. Inasmuch, therefore, as the Northern States are disabled from giving effect to the Convention, we see no remedy, except the opening of postal relations with the Southern States; and we recommend that notice be given to the Northern States that this course must be adopted, if they (the Northern States) persist in refusing to make arrangements with the South for the transmission of the foreign correspondence. The Northern States may be required to return the amount of postage received on the letters returned through the Dead Letter Office.

Blockade of Savannah and its subsequent interruption.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me two despatches and inclosures from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (Nos. 270 and 272), reporting the establishment of the blockade of Savannah and its subsequent interruption; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations which I may have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That inasmuch as it does not appear that any British vessel has been warned off or captured at Savannah, or that any British interests are involved, either in the establishment of the blockade (on the 28th May) or by its subsequent discontinuance or interruption (from about the 1st of June to the 5th of that month, the date of the Consul's despatch to Lord Lyons), I do not conceive that these papers require any observations from me in point of general principle.

I will merely point out with reference to my Report of June 6,* on the cases of the "Monmouth" and the "Hilja," that the "Monmouth" was warned off Charleston, "and all the Southern Coast of the United States of America, it being blockaded," and her papers were endorsed to that effect by an officer of the United States' frigate "Niagara" on the 12th May; her owners suggest that she had an alternative destination for Savannah, to which port this warning prevented her from going.

It would now appear that Savannah was not blockaded at all until about the 28th of May; if this turns out to be the fact, it may have an important bearing on the claim of the owners of the "Monmouth" for compensation.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That all the British vessels at Mobile when it was blockaded, except two, have left the port without hindrance, and there was no apprehension that these two would be interfered with: all British ships appear also to have quitted Pensacola without molestation.

The United States' officer in command of the blockade (Captain Porter, of the "Powhatan") appears to have acted courteously and liberally; and it is for your Lordship to consider the propriety of acknowledging his conduct.

The Consul in his despatch to Lord Lyons of the 29th May, says, "the 'Powhatan' has sailed to the eastward;" he does not say when she so sailed, or whether the port was at the above date actually blockaded, or supposed to be so, by any, and what, United States' cruizers, or was altogether open, which he should have done.

to me two despatches, and inclosures, from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (Nos. 235 and 236), relative to the circumstance of the Cunard Company's steamer "Kedar" having been lately chartered by the United States' Government, and also respecting the question of the conveyance of the despatches of that Government on board the Cunard Company's packets; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with any observations which I may have to offer thereupon.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That these papers are not in such a shape as so enable me to offer any useful observations thereon.

I cannot gather from them either the facts, dates, or legal questions upon which my opinion is required.

As far as I understand Mr. Cunard's letter to Lord Lyon's of the 1st June, 1861, no international question has arisen, or is anticipated, as to the chartering of the "Kedar" by the United States' Government. The charter-party is stated to have expired May 11; and the nature and object of the service or employment of the vessel is not stated.

I must, therefore, request that if my opinion is desired, the facts and dates may be stated, and the nature of the international question involved or anticipated may be indicated.

Seizure of the British barque "Hiawatha" on a charge of breach of blockade of Norfolk.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 5, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd of July instant, stating that with reference to my report of the 18th of June ultimo, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 273), inclosing copies of his correspondence with the United States' Secretary of State, and with Her Majesty's Consul at New York, respecting the case of the British barque "Hiawatha," which has been taken to New York as a prize on a charge of breach of blockade.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that Lord Lyons' despatch No. 191 of the 11th of May, referred to in this present despatch, is contained in the accompanying printed copy of papers lately laid before Parliament, respecting the blockade of the Southern ports; and to request that I would again take the case of the "Hiawatha" into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with such further observations as I may have to offer in regard to it.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to add, that Her Majesty's Minister at Washington has been instructed to direct the Consul at New York to watch the case.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to inclose the draft of the instructions to Lord Lyons, as well as the draft of the answer returned to Messrs. Gilliat and Co.; and to state that your Lordship would be glad to have my opinion as to the expediency, or otherwise, of any further communication being for the present addressed to these gentlemen.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th of July instant, transmitting a further letter from Messrs. Gilliat on this subject, dated July 3, 1861.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the "Hiawatha" (as I understand the facts) was captured on the 20th of May, by the United States' cruizer "Minnesota," for breach of the blockade, not of Charleston, but of Norfolk, Virginia, by egress therefrom. Consul Archibald, in his despatch to Lord Lyons of May 29, states that she was captured for the alleged violation of the blockade of the port of Charleston, but I presume that this is erroneous.

The date of the commencement of the blockade of Norfolk is not set forth in the papers. Her lading was complete on the 15th of May; she commenced her voyage on the 17th; she was, on her voyage "down the river," boarded more than once, and allowed to pass outwards by "officers of the United States' Government" (whoever they may have been); she proceeded on the 18th; was windbound on the 19th; and proceeded finally on her voyage on the 20th, the day of her capture. I presume that one question is, whether she was fairly within the terms or spirit of the fifteen days' concession set forth in Mr. Gideon Wells' letter of May 11 at page 11 of the printed Parliamentary Papers.

It will be seen that from the want of the date of the commencement of the blockade of Norfolk, I am unable to form any conclusive opinion on this question; and if this date can be accurately supplied, I request that it may be done.

If this blockade actually commenced on the 30th of April, as would appear from the notifications of Captain Pendergrast (at pages 5 and 12 of the printed papers), and from no other date being suggested by the Consul, then I fear that the case is not within the letter or spirit of the "fifteen days' concession;" and that inasmuch as Lord Lyons' application for her release as a matter of favour has failed, Her Majesty's Government can do no more for her at present, more especially adverting to inclosures 9 and 11 at page 10 of the printed papers above referred to; the fate of the ship and cargo must therefore rest for the present with the Prize Court. The fact of "officers of the United States' Government" having allowed her to pass outwards on the 17th of May, seems strongly in her favour; if they were aware of the commencement of the blockade on the 30th of April, I do not see why they did this.

It is to be remarked, however, that the period of fifteen days, without reference to the date at which the lading was completed, was a voluntary and liberal concession to neutrals on the part of the United States; and if the "Hiawatha" has failed (howsoever) to bring herself within its terms or spirit, Her Majesty's Government has no ground of complaint at the vessel being sent before the Prize Court. Seeing, however, that this is the first, and possibly the the only, British vessel captured for breach of blockade, and that her master appears to have had no deliberate design to break this particular blockade, it would be a gracious act on the part of the United States to release her. This Government, however, may possibly feel (as Her Majesty's Government might feel in a similar case) that the captor's claims should be considered, and that the question should be left to the Prize Court.

Messrs. Gilliat and Co. may be informed that Lord Lyons has unsuccessfully attempted to procure her release from the United States' Government, and that by the last advices she was to be sent before the Prize Court at New York, where they should act for themselves under legal advice in support of their interests.

No additional instructions to Lord Lyons seems to be required, but his attention should be called to the circumstance of her being boarded and permitted to pass "down the river," on the 17th, by "officers of the United States," which requires explanation, and the Consul at Richmond may, perhaps, be enabled to add some material information.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd July instant, transmitting a letter and its inclosures from the Admiralty, dated June 28th last, reporting the circumstances under which this vessel was handed over by the Sultan to the Commander of Her Majesty's ship "Persian."

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

1. That the existing Treaties between Her Majesty and the Sultan of Zanzibar with which I requested to be furnished in my former Report are not forthcoming.

2. That these papers do not enable me to express any further opinion on this case.

3. The proceedings against this vessel before the "Mixed Commission Court at the Cape" (I presume the Spanish Mixed Commission Court established under the Treaty of 1835) should be sent home, with a special report on the facts and law by the Advocate acting for the Crown in the suit, in case of the Spanish Government hereafter raising any question of jurisdiction or otherwise. Copies of the "ship's papers," and all particulars of the vessel and her proceedings, should be transmitted to Spain, with a request for the condign punishment of all concerned (see the Spanish Law of 1845, 7 Hertslet's Treaties, 1014).

4. The repeated misconduct of the French Consul in covering the Slave Trade, and his pretensions to interfere on behalf of all Roman Catholic slave-traders, of whatever nationality, having no Treaties or international relations with the Sultan of Zanzibar, as detailed by Colonel Rigby, should be brought to the notice of the French Government with a view to his speedy removal.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying letter dated the 24th June last, and its inclosure, from the Ottoman Bank, requesting that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople may be instructed to interfere in order to obtain payment of a bill for 151,567 piastres drawn by the Superior of the Convent of Antonaki, and discounted by the branch of the Ottoman Bank at Beyrout; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to how far Her Majesty's Government would be justified in interfering in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That although the Law Officers' Report of the 12th April, 1859, upon a very similar claim from "the Ottoman Bank," is not adverted to in these papers, it appears to me, in effect, to dispose of this case, and to show that Her Majesty's Government cannot interfere.

Claim of Mr. O'Connor to property on board the "Hiawatha," seized for breach of blockade.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 6, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd July instant, stating that with reference to his letter of the 2nd July instant respecting the case of the "Hiawatha," he was directed to transmit to me a letter from Mr. O'Connor dated the 24th June last, stating that he is interested in the cargo of that vessel, and also that he has a quantity of tobacco at Richmond which he cannot get away, and which he is afraid may be seized by the Northern States.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that Mr. O'Connor also refers to the case of his ship the "Queen of England" which is now lying in Hampton Roads; and to request that I would take Mr. O'Connor's letter into consideration, and advise your Lordship as to the answer which should be returned to it.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this letter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That three separate cases are mentioned in Mr. O'Connor's letter:—

1. Tobacco purchased and paid for in Virginia in March, and which he states to be now "remaining at Richmond without possibility of removal, and which may be seized by the Northern States." I do not see any probability of this property being so seized; private property on land, such as tobacco belonging to a neutral, is not likely to be treated as prize or booty, even in the event of the capture of Richmond by the United States' forces, which does not seem to be immediately impending. If it is laden on board it should be unshipped and warehoused; the blockade may prevent its removal, but with this your Lordship cannot interfere.

2. Twenty hogsheads of tobacco on board the "Hiawatha." This is disposed of by my Report of the 5th July instant on that case. The fact of this tobacco being Mr. O'Connor's property may be mentioned to Lord Lyons. Mr. O'Conner may be informed to this effect; and further that Lord Lyons' efforts to procure the release of this ship and cargo have failed, and that the case is now before the Prize Court at New York, to which he must have recourse as he may be advised.

3. His vessel the "Queen of England" now lying in Hampton Roads waiting to take his tobacco, purchased in March, from Richmond, Virginia, to England. Under existing circumstances, especially considering that there exists a blockade of all Virginian ports, it is impossible for your Lordship to interfere in this case.

An answer to the above effect may be returned to Mr. O'Connor, and a copy of his letter sent to Lord Lyons for his consideration in the event of its being found practicable to do anything on Mr. O'Connor's behalf.

Tonnage duties levied on packets and colliers of the Liverpool Pacific Steam Navigation Company.

"Patente," or trading licence, levied on agency of the Company at Panamá.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 10, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a letter from the Liverpool Pacific Steam Navigation Company, dated the 8th of June ultimo, setting forth the circumstances under which they request the interference of Her Majesty's Government with the Government of New Granada, respecting the following matters:—

1. Tonnage dues at one time levied on the Company's packets, and up to the present time on the colliers chartered by them.

2. The "patente," or trading licence, levied on the agency of the Company at Panamá.

1861

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that, as regards the latter point, he was to transmit to me a further letter which your Lordship has received from the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company since the date of my Report of the 6th May last, and to request that I would report whether the statements therein contained modify my previous opinion on the subject.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that with respect, however, to the tonnage dues, I should perceive from the correspondence therewith transmitted to me that these duties have been levied in virtue of a New Granadian Law (26th June, 1857), and that except in the case of the vessels of the Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company (exempted by special stipulation) the tax has been considered as leviable on the ships of all nations.

That the merchant-vessels of the United States have, however, uniformly refused to pay these duties; and the United States' vessels of war on each side of the Isthmus of Panamá have been instructed to resist the levying of the tax.

That under these circumstances British vessels have paid the duties under protest; but that Her Majesty's Government did not consider it expedient to enter into a discussion on the subject until they should be made acquainted with the result of a negotiation which was for some time pending between the Governments of the United States and of New Granada, and which might include a settlement of the points in dispute.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that the Convention between the two Governments alluded to, which was signed at Washington on the 10th of September, 1857, and of which the ratifications were exchanged on the 5th of November last, did not contain any stipulations affecting the point in question; and that it now becomes a question whether Her Majesty's Government will be justified in resisting the action of the tonnage duties imposed on British vessels, or calling upon the New Granadian Government to refund the duties which British subjects have paid under protest since the promulgation of the Law of 1857; and to request that I would take this subject into consideration and report to your Lordship my opinion on the points above referred to.

The former correspondence on this subject was inclosed for convenience of reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That I have so frequently reported upon these questions, and so often pointed out the information which was required, and remarked upon the singular manner in which the Pacific Steam-Navigation Company has hitherto persisted in withholding the necessary information, of which it has always been in possession, that I can only refer to my former Reports, especially to those of the 13th December, 1856, 3rd February and 27th March, 1857, and the 6th May, 1861.

Whether the substance of my Reports of 1856 and 1857 was promptly conveyed to the Company I know not. If this was done, the Company has taken, at least, four years to answer the questions put to it. However this may be, the only material answer or additional information now forthcoming is contained in the Company's letters of the 8th and 20th June, and Memorandum of the 1st July, 1861. This information seems to me to be very unsatisfactory.

It would now appear that the only opinions which the Company has ever obtained upon the legality of the tax of which it has been complaining for many years were: first, that of Mr. Consul Perry (who was also the Company's agent); and next, that of Mr. Consul Henderson; and that the Company has advisedly abstained not only from any legal proceedings calculated to raise the question of the legality of the tax, but also from obtaining any legal opinion in England or New Granada on the subject.

The Company asserts, in its Memorandum of the 1st July, 1861, that it "does not act in the capacity of merchants or traders, and therefore that the Directors do not consider that they are legally liable."

Such a mode of dealing with a legal question is wholly unworthy of a great public Company: if it has any case, it is trifling with Her Majesty's Government; and if it has none, it is endeavouring to mislead Her Majesty's Government, and dealing with it as it would not be allowed to deal with another Company or firm in an ordinary matter of business.

If the Company is not "a merchant or trader," and not within the terms or spirit of the Law, it can surely obtain good legal opinions to this effect, with reasons, and transmit them (together with the text of the Law) to Her Majesty's Government. Until it does this, it has not made out any primâ facie case for the interference of Her Majesty's Government.

It is, moreover, to be borne in mind that the Company, after paying the tax for many years, has ceased to pay it since April 1860, when in some manner, which is not explained, it became exempt therefrom (see letter of the 8th June); and it now desires Her Majesty's Government to make New Granada refund what it has received from the Company.

The Convention between New Granada and the United States signed in 1857, and ratified on the 5th of November last, is not transmitted; but inasmuch as it is stated "not to contain any stipulations affecting the point in question," I presume that it has no bearing on the case.

I cannot discover that the subjects or the Governments of any other foreign nation but those of the United States have resisted the tax; and there are probably special grounds on which the resistance of the United States is founded, which are not set forth by the Company.

The steady increase of the tax appears very oppressive, and the mode of its assessment to be open to objection; but this is a totally distinct question from that of the Company's legal liability; and it is hardly possible for Her Majesty's Government to object to the mode of assessment alone, without (by implication) admitting such liability.

Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot advise your Lordship to interfere. Either the Company's case has no sound foundation, or the Company is so utterly incapable of stating and establishing its case (which has now lasted for many years) in an ordinary, business-like, and rational manner, that Her Majesty's Government cannot safely take any international step in its favour.

UNITED STATES.

Interference on behalf of British subjects taken by United States' authorities while serving on board Southern privateers.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington (No. 259), requesting to be instructed as to whether, and if so, how far, he is to interfere on behalf of British subjects who may be taken by United States' authorities while serving on board Southern privateers; and to request that we would take this despatch into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with our opinion as to the answer it may be expedient to return thereto.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to annex, for our information, a draft of the letter respecting Rear-Admiral Milne's instructions which was addressed to the Admiral, on the receipt of the Law Officers' Report of the 13th June ultimo,* and to add that a copy of that letter has been sent to Lord Lyons.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That Lord Lyons should be instructed not to interfere unless he shall see sufficient grounds for apprehending that one or more of Her Majesty's subjects, captured on board (Southern) Confederate privateers, will be treated by the United States' authorities as pirates, and not as prisoners of war: should reasonable grounds for such apprehension exist, then he should at once address an urgent remonstrance to the United States' Government, and state therein that should such remonstrance be disregarded, the consequences may be, in the estimation of Her Majesty's Government, very serious, and must be accepted by the Government of the United States.

We may add that the nature of Lord Lyons' communication is rather a question of Imperial policy for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government than of mere law; and that inasmuch as a Southern (Confederate) privateer has recently been captured by a United States' cruizer, the crew of which privateer did not, we believe, comprise any British subject, something may turn upon the manner in which her crew may be treated by the United States' Government.

Expediency of concluding Conventions for the better ascertainment of the Law of Foreign Countries when pleaded in Courts within Her Majesty's Dominions.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 16, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 29th June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the accompanying letter from Mr. A. M. Dunlop, M.P., calling attention to the Act 24 Vict., cap. 11, entitled "An Act to afford facilities for the better ascertainment of the Law of Foreign Countries when pleaded in Courts within Her Majesty's Dominions" (which refers to Act 22 and 23 Vict., cap. 43), and representing the advantage which would accrue from Conventions being entered into with foreign countries on this subject, and to request that we would furnish your Lordship with our opinion as to the course which it may be advisable for Her Majesty's Government to take in this matter.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this matter into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That we are of opinion that it will be advisable for Her Majesty's Government to take steps for negotiating Conventions, in accordance with the statute, with those foreign countries with which Her Majesty's subjects have most frequent dealings.

We would suggest that copies of the Statute be sent to the principal foreign Legations, with instructions to communicate with the proper authorities, and report whether a favourable disposition is manifested towards such Conventions.

Imprisonment of Mr. T. M. White.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 15, 1861.

WE were honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th of June last, stating that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us a further despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in Peru (No. 23), respecting the case of Mr. Thomas Melville White, which formed the subject of Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th of June last.*

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have carefully considered the above-mentioned papers, and have the honour to report—

That, with reference to the case of Mr. Melville White, these papers require no additional observations; they throw no light either upon the nature of the case attempted to be made against him, or the evidence by which it is supported, or upon the legality of his arrest and imprisonment.

With reference to the exemption of Mr. Jerningham from any obligation to give evidence before a Peruvian Judge, and to his entire exemption from the jurisdiction of the Peruvian Courts. we are of opinion that Mr. Jerningham is, in the matter in question (by general international law), wholly exempt from the jurisdiction of any Peruvian Judge or Court; and that he cannot be legally compelled to give evidence in any criminal proceeding in Peru. He has, in our opinion, taken a correct view of his own position in this respect.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 15, 1861.

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 28th of June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to us a further despatch and its inclosures from Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Lima (No. 22), respecting the administration to the property of the late Mr. Winder.*

We are also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 1st of July instant, transmitting a letter from Messrs. Dawes dated the 29th of June last, together with the former papers relating to this subject.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That the letter from Messrs. Dawes and Sons, solicitors, of the 29th June, does not alter or affect our previous Report.

The despatch of Mr. Jerningham, No. 22 and inclosures, disclose the disgraceful conduct of Judge Ponce in sheltering in his house Manuel Winder, in resisting the execution of the warrant for his apprehension, and in presenting pistols and threatening to shoot Mr. Carwell.

These facts must at least disqualify Judge Ponce from intermeddling any further with this case, and it is to be hoped may lead to his disgrace.

Rules and Regulations in force in Consular Courts in China.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 15, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 25th of June ultimo, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a copy of a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister in China (No. 19), inclosing copies of all Rules and Regulations issued by the Chief Superintendent of Trade under the Order in Council of the 13th of June, 1853, and now in force in Her Majesty's Consular Courts in China; together with copies of the printed forms of Judicial Oaths, and of the Table of Judicial Fees.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state, that these copies were forwarded for my own use; but that your Lordship would be glad to receive my observations should I have any to offer in regard to them.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken the papers transmitted into consideration, and have to report—

That I respectfully submit that some omission or error has probably taken place in this matter. The only documents transmitted are:—

1. Rules of Practice to be observed in Judicial Proceedings before Her Majesty's Consuls in China, made in conformity with the provisions of Article 37 of Her Majesty's Order in Council of June 13, 1853;
2. Form No. 10 (of Oaths);
3. Schedule B, Table of Fees in Civil Causes.

Mr. Bruce, in No. 19, states that he incloses "copies of all Rules and Regulations issued by the Chief Superintendent of Trade under the Order in Council of June 13, 1853, and now in force in Her Majesty's Consular Courts in China."

By reference to Section 3 of the above Order, it will be seen that the Chief Superintendent was to make, and enforce by fine and imprisonment, "Rules and Regulations, (1) for the observance of the stipulations of Treaties, and (2) for the peace, order, and good government of Her Majesty's subjects being within the dominions of the Emperor of China, or being within any British ship or vessel at a distance of not more than one hundred miles from the coast of China, and to enforce in like manner such Rules and Regulations as had theretofore been made and continued unrepealed."

Sections 4, 5, and 6 contain further important provisions as to the enforcing such Rules and Regulations.

Some such Rules and Regulations must, I apprehend, be in force in China. The urgent necessity for such Rules and Regulations, and the importance of their being suited to the circumstances of each country, and properly framed, has frequently been adverted to by the Law Officers (see particularly as to Japan, the Law Officers' Report of April 26, 1861, on Mr. Moss' case), and it is desirable that the Law Officers should see them.

The inclosed documents only relate to "rules of practice" in proceedings before Consuls, under Section 37 of the above Order in Council; and if your Lordship should consider it to be desirable to deal with these "rules of practice" alone, as they now stand, I must request the assistance of the Attorney and Solicitor-General in so doing.

Consular Rules and Regulations for the observance of Treaties, and for the peace, order, and good government of Her Majesty's subjects in Mahometan and Pagan countries.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 15, 1861.

I BEG respectfully to recall attention to my letter of the 30th July, 1860, on the subject of Consular Rules and Regulations for the observance of Treaties, and for the peace, order, and good government of Her Majesty's subjects in Mahometan and Pagan countries. Except as to the Ottoman Empire (as to which see Report of Law Officers, November 19, 1860, and documents therewith), this matter still remains in entire obscurity, at least as far as my information extends.

In the cases of Japan, Siam, Morocco, and China, either no sufficient Consular Rules or Regulations have been made and published, or they are not forthcoming. The practical importance of this subject is apparent, especially from the recent case of Mr. Moss (Japan), and the necessary steps should be taken without loss of time.

As regards Morocco, the matter has apparently been in hand (howsoever) since October 1858, and remains hitherto without any satisfactory result (see Law Officers' Report, November 20, 1860).

WE are honoured by your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 11th May last, stating that he was directed to transmit to us the draft of a despatch which your Lordship proposes to address to Her Majesty's Consul at Panamá, in regard to the pretension of the Government of New Granada to exercise jurisdiction over British merchant-vessels within their ports, and to close to foreign commerce ports that are not subject to their authority.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state that the despatch of Mr. Consul Henderson is founded upon the opinion of Her Majesty's Advocate-General, and to request that we would inform your Lordship whether we consider the terms of the proposed despatch to be right and proper.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have taken this despatch into consideration, and have the honour to report—

Proceedings of Consul Druce respecting the vessels "Liberty" and "Mompox," and documents belonging to Custom-house at Carthagena.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 16, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd July instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 16th March last, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch, dated the 10th of May last, and its inclosures, from Mr. Druce, in explanation of his proceedings with regard to the vessels "Liberty" and "Mompox," and the documents belonging to the Custom-house at Carthagena.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to transmit a letter, dated the 11th of of June last, and its inclosures, from the Admiralty, containing Commander Lyons account of his share in the transactions of which Señor Nieto complained in his letter of the 7th September, 1860; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with my opinion upon the explanations offered by Mr. Druce and Commander Lyons.

The previous papers were inclosed for convenience of reference.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That as regards the "Liberty," I observe that Mr. Druce expresses his regret that he did not officially communicate to Señor Nieto the fact that she had changed her national character, and received a British provisional certificate of registry, which he clearly ought to have done; neither did he communicate (as he ought to have done) in his original account of the case, the fact that she went to Jamaica, as was originally contemplated, and there completed her registration as a British vessel. She was in a certain sense a British vessel when interfered with by Señor Nieto, and I see no occasion for any further observations on this case.

I would observe, that although Mr. Druce's conduct cannot be entirely approved, yet his errors were rather errors of form than errors of substance; and I do not consider Commander Lyons deserving of any blame under the circumstances.

As to the "Mompox," neither Mr. Druce's nor Commander Lyons' explanations affect my opinion. I see no sufficient justification for their conduct: the circumstances were so simple, and the national character of the ship so obvious, that I do not consider that Commander Lyons was bound to act, as he did, at the Consul's suggestion, without exercising his own judgment. A British naval officer should beware of interfering with a foreign vessel, even at the suggestion of a Consul, without satisfying himself of his right to do so: here there was no right, and no fair pretext of right. I observe that Admiral Milne entertains the same opinion.

The other subjects alluded to in these despatches do not appear to be in such a shape as to require any observations from me.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 3rd July instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 16th of April last,* respecting Messrs. Syers, Braasch, and Co.'s complaint against the Venezuelan Government, in regard to the alleged partial application of their Decree of the 24th of August, 1860, exempting certain goods from duty, he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Mr. Orme (No. 40), inclosing, in accordance with my request, a copy of the Decree in question; and to request that I would take this paper, together with the previous ones, therewith returned to me, into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion whether Her Majesty's Government would be justified in giving any support to Messrs. Syers' complaint.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this paper into consideration, together with the previous ones, and have the honour to report—

Closing and blockade, by New Granadian Government, of ports in New Granada.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 18, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 4th July instant, stating that with reference to my Report of the 8th June last, therewith returned for my convenience, he was directed to transmit to me a correspondence which has passed between your Lordship and the New Granadian Minister in this country regarding the intentions of the New Granadian Government in the matter of the closing and blockade of ports in New Granada; and to request that I would report to your Lordship any observations which I may have to offer on this subject.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th instant, transmitting a translation of some extracts from the Custom-house Code of New Granada, which have been communicated to your Lordship by M. Martin.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this subject into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, being wholly without information of the view entertained by Her Majesty's Government of the status inter gentes of the contending States, or parties, in New Granada, as, for instance, whether Her Majesty's Government regards them both as belligerents, or one as the only legitimate Federal Government, and the other as traitors or rebels against it, it is not an easy matter for me to offer any advice. Should the status of the two parties be that of belligerentes inter se, the case falls within the principle laid down in the Law Officers' Report of the 25th June ultimò, on the United and Confederate States of North America. I can only repeat that no British property, either ashore or afloat, has been as yet molested; and I do not distinctly understand in what shape or manner this undesirable result is practically imminent, or to be immediately apprehended.

Subject to these observations, Señor Martin's note of the 21st June last is open to the following observations:—

1st. At page 2 translation, this note distinctly disclaims any intention on the part of the Federal (or Central) Government of blockading the seceding ports with a competent force.

2ndly. It further states that the orders issued to the Custom-house boats of war, to watch the "coasts of the closed ports," have not been carried into effect.

3rdly. It does not frankly state either what is really about to be done with British vessels trading or attempting to trade with those ports.

4thly. Nor does it admit (what is perhaps the truth) that nothing is going to be done excepting on paper; and that all the apparatus of Laws and Decrees cited and referred to, and even the "circular" in question, are mere devices to deter British merchants from dealing with the seceding ports.

I can only suggest that a note may, perhaps, be addressed to Señor Martin, expressing the satisfaction with which your Lordship observes that no blockade is contemplated, and that no extraordinary measures have been resorted to as to the ports or coasts of the Seceding States; and the confident expectation entertained by Her Majesty's Government that no measures will be enforced against British ships or goods in relation to their intercourse with the ports in question which will call for the intervention of Her Majesty's Government; and that with all due respect for the Laws and Decrees of the Government of New Granada, your Lordship must observe that questions may arise as to their entire conformity with international law, in the event of their being so interpreted and enforced as to cause any loss or injury to British subjects, and that great caution will be requisite in enforcing them against peaceable British merchants who do not enter into the international discussions unhappily raging in New Granada

Claims of owners of "Cestus" and "Caledonia," under Decree of General Rosas, of February 13, 1845.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 18, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 6th July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister to the Argentine Republic (No. 43), respecting the claims of the owners of two vessels, the "Caledonia" and the "Cestus," on account of the manner in which a Decree of General Rosas, dated February 13, 1845, translation of which was therewith inclosed, was put in operation in the case of those vessels, and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship my opinion as to the instructions which should be addressed to Mr. Thornton on this subject.

---

* Page 66.

1861

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That these claims seem to have been preferred (howsoever) before a Commission now sitting (I presume) at Paraná, under some Convention between Great Britain and "the Argentine Government," whatever that designation may include or signify. If this be so, it is obvious that without a copy of this Convention, and the instructions to the Commissioners, I cannot deal with the case. I presume from Mr. Thornton's despatch that the Argentine Government is clearly liable to British claimants in respect of losses ensuing upon the Decrees or Acts of General Rosas. Sed quo jure? I know not.

Mr. Thornton does not explain what is the actual position of the cases either of the "Cestus" or of the "Caledonia;" whether he, or who else, has advocated their cases before the Commission; whether the parties interested have been heard or are yet to be heard before the Commission, by Counsel or agents; whether the decision of the Commission is final; what jurisdiction, and with what limitations, is vested in the Commission; as to the amount of compensation or consequential damages which they may award, and so forth. Neither does he state whether he only wants suggestions for influencing the opinions of the Commissioners, or in what way he proposes to "insist," after what he describes as "the positive refusal of the Commissioners."

In short, I have seldom seen, even a South American case, a question so obscurely stated as this: all the necessary facts are within Mr. Thornton's intimate knowledge; but he keeps them so carefully to himself, that he has effectually prevented me from apprehending them. I must, therefore, request further information to enable me to advise your Lordship properly.

Liability of Daniel Swan, a British subject domiciled in the Netherlands, to military service.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 13th July instant, stating that, with reference to my Report of the 3rd instant,* therewith returned to me, together with the despatches on which it was founded (Nos. 19 and 23), he was directed to transmit to me some further despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at the Hague (Nos. 31, 32, and 33), containing the information which I require respecting the case of Daniel Swan, and the Dutch laws bearing upon it; and to request that I would now take this case into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with my opinion thereupon.

I am also honoured with Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 16th July instant, transmitting further despatches from Sir Andrew Buchanan bearing on this case.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken this case into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That, as regards Swan's case, it is to be hoped that in consideration of the circumstances, his petition to the King may be granted, and this particular case amicably settled, without necessitating any international discussion, either of the facts or of the principle involved.

As regards the amendment and settlement of the Dutch law for the future, the Clause proposed to be added to Article 18 of the Militia Bill now before the States-General (Inclosure in Sir A. Buchanan's No. 34) will, according to my apprehension, if liberally construed, suffice to provide for the exemption hereafter of the sons of British subjects in pari conditione with Swan.

There is no practical liability imposed on aliens in England to serve in the Militia, inasmuch as the Militia ballot is not in fact resorted to; even their theoretical liability thereto is a matter not free from legal doubt; and they are under no liability at all to compulsory military service in the army. If, therefore, this amendment is clearly intended and understood to apply to England, and if adequate words are employed in the clause to give it this effect (which should be duly attended to by Sir A. Buchanan), this matter may be settled on a satisfactory footing, and an international discussion avoided; which is the more desirable, inasmuch as the Dutch law, however harsh in its operation, seems to be clearly in favour of the claim of the Dutch Government.

Protection of British commerce on West Coast of North America.

My Lord, Doctors' Commons, July 20, 1861.

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 19th July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me, with the former papers, a letter from the Admiralty dated the 8th instant, inclosing copies of two despatches from Rear-Admiral Milne, together with a copy of additional instructions issued by him, for the guidance of cruizers employed in the protection of British commerce on the West Coast of North America; and to request that I would take these papers into consideration, and report to your Lordship whether I see any reason why the additional instruction issued by Rear-Admiral Milne should not be approved.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands I have taken these papers into consideration, and have the honour to report—

That this is a question rather of Imperial and international policy than of law; but having regard to Admiral Milne's despatch No. 262 (26th of June), and to your Lordship's letter to the Admiralty of June 14th, and especially to the remarks therein contained upon my observations on the 4th and 9th Article of Admiral Milne's original instructions, I can see no reason why the additional or supplementary instructions issued by Admiral Milne, from on board Her Majesty's ship "Nile," at Halifax, on the 20th of June ultimo, should not be approved by Her Majesty's Government.

Additional Instructions for the Guidance of Cruizers employed in the Protection of British Commerce on the West Coast of North America.

"Nile," at Halifax, June 20, 1861.

Article 1. Any merchant ship fallen in with flying the flag of the Confederate States is to be treated in all respects the same as those under the United States' flag.

Article 2. Conjoint cruizing of United States' and Her Majesty's ships of war in the suppression of the Slave Trade is no longer to be carried on, as it might lead to an infringement of the strict neutrality that is to be observed.

Article 3. Her Majesty's Government having, with a view to carrying out more effectually the principles of neutrality, interdicted the armed ships, as well as the privateers, of both parties from carrying prizes made by them into the ports, harbours, roadsteads, or waters of the United Kingdom, or of any Her Majesty's Colonies or Possessions abroad, you are to govern yourself accordingly; understanding, however, that this restriction applies to prizes seeking protection from an enemy, or sent to ports to await adjudication, and not to vessels putting into British ports from stress of weather, or being otherwise in distress.

Article 4. As neither of the two contending parties have as yet acceded to the Paris Convention of 1856 (see "Hertslet's Treaties," vol. x, page 547), with respect to free ships making free goods and goods of neutrals not being seizable in enemies' ships, the rules laid down in that Declaration will not be applicable to British vessels and goods.

Article 5. The right of visit and search is regarded by Her Majesty's Government as a right appertaining to the lawfully commissioned cruizers of belligerents when exercised by them subject to and in conformity with the modern law and usage of nations.

Article 6. Excepting as to arms, ammunition, and military stores (which are clearly contraband of war by the common law and usage of nations), it must be left to the Government and Prize Courts of the belligerents, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, to define what articles will be considered and treated by them as contraband of war.

Extradition Treaty with Great Britain.

My Lord,

WE are honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 2nd February last, stating that he was directed to acknowledge the receipt of our Report of the 19th December last, on the Draft of a Treaty of Extradition between Great Britain and Denmark. That while approving of the draft generally, we stated that it was our opinion that the latter part of the first Article was obscure, and greatly needed a more clear and simple statement of the procedure that will be required in England for the surrender of a person demanded by the Danish Government.

Lord Wodehouse was also pleased to state, that judging from the experience of what had taken place under the Convention with France of 1843 (which the Draft Convention with Denmark follows in the passage upon which we remark), your Lordship doubts whether any misapprehension would be likely to arise on the part of the Danish Government, in regard to the conditions required in England for the surrender of any person demanded by them under the Convention; but your Lordship would nevertheless be glad if we would examine the clause in question, and suggest such alterations therein as will make it, in our opinion, more satisfactory.

In obedience to your Lordship's commands we have the honour to report—

That we have, in compliance with your Lordship's request, again examined the latter part of Article I of the Draft of a Treaty of Extradition between Great Britain and Denmark, to which we particularly adverted in our former Report, and we have suggested in the Draft now laid before us such alterations as appear to us to be called for, in order that that part of the Treaty may be rendered satisfactory.

We have, &c.

Case of the "Edward," sent to New York by blockading squadron, though not as a prize.

My Lord,

I AM honoured with your Lordship's commands signified in Lord Wodehouse's letter of the 15th July instant, stating that he was directed to transmit to me a despatch from Her Majesty's Consul at Charleston (No. 73), reporting the case of the British barque "Edward," which having arrived off the Southern Coast of America with a cargo of salt and coal, was warned off that coast by the United States' blockading squadron, and was eventually sent to New York, though not as a prize; and to request that I would take this case into consideration, and furnish your Lordship with my opinion thereupon.
